

THE WAR IN EASTERN EUROPE

JOHN REED

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/isbn_9781230446899

THE WAR IN EASTERN EUROPE • JOHN REED AND BOARDMAN ROBINSON

Publisher's Note

The book descriptions we ask booksellers to display prominently warn that the book may have numerous typos, missing text, images and indexes.

We scanned this book using character recognition software that includes an automated spell check. Our software is 99 percent accurate if the book is in good condition. However, we do understand that even one percent can be a very annoying number of typos! And sometimes all or part of a page is missing from our copy of a book. Or the paper may be so discolored from age that you can no longer read the type. Please accept our sincere apologies.

After we re-typeset and design a book, the page numbers change so the old index and table of contents no longer work. Therefore, we often remove them.

We would like to manually proof read and fix the typos and indexes, manually scan and add any illustrations, and track down another copy of the book to add any missing text. But our books sell so few copies, you would have to pay up to a thousand dollars for the book as a result.

Therefore, whenever possible, we let our customers download a free copy of the original typo-free scanned book. Simply enter the barcode number from the back cover of the paperback in the Free Book form at www.general-books.net. You may also qualify for a free trial membership in our book club to download up to four books for free. Simply enter the barcode number from the back cover onto the membership form on the same page. The book club entitles you to select from more than a million books at no additional charge. Simply enter the title or subject onto the search form to find the books.

If you have any questions, could you please be so kind as to consult our Frequently Asked Questions page at www.general-books.net/faqs.cfm? You are also welcome to contact us there.

General Books LLC®, Memphis, USA,
2012. ISBN: 9781151107442.

PREFACE WHEN war broke out in August, 1914, I went immediately to Europe as correspondent of the Metro-politan Magazine, visiting England, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, and Belgium, and seeing fighting with three armies. I returned to New York in February, 1915; and a month later, Boardman Robinson and I started for Eastern Europe. This book is a record of that second trip.

It was to be a three-months' flying journey: we were going to see Italy enter the war, Venice destroyed by the Austrians; be in Serbia in time for the last stand of the Serbs; watch Rumania plunge into the conflict; stand by at the fall of Constantinople; accompany the Russian steam-roller to Berlin; and spend a month in the Caucasus reporting barbarically colored battles between Cossacks and Turks.

As a matter of fact, we were gone seven months and didn't see one of these grand dramatic climaxes. Except for getting mixed up with the great Russian retreat, and flitting through the Balkans at the beginning of the German drive, it was our luck everywhere to arrive during a comparative lull in the hostilities. And for that very reason, perhaps, we were better able to observe the more normal life of the Eastern nations, under the steady strain of long-drawn-out warfare. In the excitement of sudden invasion, desperate resistance, capture and destruction of cities, men seem to lose their distinctive personal or racial flavor, and become alike in the mad democracy of battle. As we saw them, they had settled down to war as a business, had begun to adjust themselves to this new way of life and to talk and think of other things.

When we arrived in Italy, the most disappointing calm prevailed; but alarming rumors of the imminent capture of Constantinople caused us to drop everything and sail for Dedeagatch. At Salonika, however, the news from Turkey was so disconcertingly placid that we left the ship there and made a trip into Serbia, then devastated by typhus, and slowly recovering from the frightful consequences of the last Austrian invasion.

At the news of Rumanian mobilization we made for Bucarest hotfoot—to find much smoke but little fire.

Constantinople held. So we decided to make a short dash into Russia, and return when things grew interesting at the Dardanelles. The Russian ambassador in Bucarest was polite but vague; we must go to Petrograd, he said, and through our ambassadors formally request permission to go to the front. However, the arrival of three disgusted correspondents who had acted on this advice and cooled their heels in Petrograd for three months, rather discouraged us. The Russian retreat from the Carpathians had begun, and there was fighting near Czernowitz on the north, where the Russian, Austrian, and Rumanian frontiers meet. The American minister in Bucarest kindly gave us a list of American citizens to look up as we passed; and armed with this slender excuse, we crossed the river Pruth in a small boat at night, and landed at the Russian front.

It was unprecedented. The orders were very strict that no correspondents should be allowed in these regions, but the orders specified correspondents coming from the north. We came from the south, and so, not knowing what to do with us, they sent us north. We travelled behind the Russian front through Bucovina, Galicia, and Poland—where we spent two weeks in prison. Finally released, we went to Petrograd and found ourselves out of the frying-pan but in the fire. It seems that by this time the powers that be had made up their minds to shoot us. The American embassy washed its hands of me; but Robinson, a Canadian by birth, went to the British embassy—and the British embassy finally freed us both and got us out of Russia. Needless to say, we did not go to the Caucasus.

Once more in Bucarest, I determined to see Constantinople, which seemed calmer and safer than ever. Robinson could not go because he had a British passport. Enver Pasha first promised me that I should go to the Gallipoli front; but after two weeks' waiting he said that no more Americans would be allowed with the army, because one correspondent had gone back to Paris and there published a description of the Turkish forts. About this same time I was unofficially notified that I had better leave Turkey, because the police had seen me talking with too many Armenians.

At the Bulgarian frontier I was halted and told to return to Turkey, as my passport was not properly vised. I had no money. The surly Bulgarian chief of police wouldn't communicate with the American embassy nor allow me to do so. So when the train for Sofia pulled out, I jumped aboard, riding the rods, the blind baggage, and the train top, and escaping into the fields when the train was halted and searched by soldiers.

At Bucarest I met Robinson, and together we went to Bulgaria, then on the brink of war. When the mobilization was declared we fled to Serbia—first, because Robinson was a Britisher, and, second, because I was informed by the Press Bureau that correspondents would not be allowed with the army.

In Serbia, however, we were sure of a warm welcome. But we discovered that the Serbians had all read our first two articles about themselves, and did not like them. We were told, in fact, that when hostilities commenced we would probably be expelled from the country. By that time we had had enough of the Balkans, so we went anyway.

Apparently nothing was doing in Salonika. We stayed there four or five days, but there were no more rumors than usual, and we didn't know whether anything would ever happen or not. So at length we took ship for Italy and home.

Of course we left at exactly the moment when the German and Austrian armies invaded Serbia, Bulgaria attacked her from the rear, and the English and French troops were only six hours' sail from Salonika. But we abandoned the warring nations to their respective fates and headed for New York, arriving toward the last of October.

As I look back on it all, it seems to me that the most important thing to know about the war is how the different peoples live; their environment, tradition, and the revealing things they do and say. In time of peace, many human qualities are covered up which come to the surface in a sharp crisis; but on the other hand, much of personal and racial quality is submerged in time of great public stress. And in this book Robinson and I have simply tried to give our impressions of human beings as we found them in the countries of Eastern Europe, from April to October, 1915.

J. R.

New York, March 20, 1916.

ILLUSTRATIONS Half-savage giants dressed in the ancient panoply of that curious Slavic people whose main business is war Frontispiece PACING PACE Sketches. (Olympus and Salonika) 4 V Refugee priests. (Salonika) 18

J "The Seven Jolly Carpenters." (Salonika) 20 . Precautions against the typhus. (Nish) 30

'Sketches. (Serbia—Nish) 32 -The sentry 34 -The government sends the soldiers and the oxen all over Serbia to help with the ploughing 36 i Discharged from a typhus hospital 44 i Austrian prisoners in uniform wandered freely everywhere without a guard 46 A hospital at Nish 48 . Sketches. (Along the Road) 51 . "A Little Avenger of Kossovo" 54 . Troop-trains moving north through a region of high, rolling hills 60

Looking toward Austria 66

In the Serb trenches on the Save, two hundred yards from the Austrians 70 . Dodging shrapnel on the Save 72 r.viz;

Face

The night ride to Shabatz 82 -The blackened and mutilated church, where three thousand men, women, and children were penned up together without food or water for four days. (Shabatz) 84

The woman of Goutchevo Mountain 96 'The unburied dead. (Goutchevo) 98 Hit by a bursting shell 100 , Riding behind Voyvoda Michitch and King Peter 102

"How is it with thee, O Serbia, my dear mother?" 104 . Crossing the Pruth in a flat-bottomed scow, half full of water no

"Pontoons for the Pruth 112 . Turcomans from beyond the Caspian; from the Steppes of Asia 114 Madji indicated her with his hand. "Mon maril!" "My husband!" he said in his bad French. (Bucovina).. 116

A son of Ghenghis Khan. (Turcoman) 118

Sketches. (Nova-Sielitza) 122

Gun positions in Bucovina 130 . Peasant carts jolted by with faintly groaning heaps of arms and legs. (Bucovina) 132 -Digging trenches near Zastevna 134 -The station at Tamopol 146

Refugees... waiting stolid and bewildered among their bundles 148 . Blind for life. (Kovel) 150

A soldier on duty gaped for several minutes at our puttees.

(Tamopol) 154 FACING MCE .i Chanting legions. (Lemberg) 164 i Sketches. (On the Way to Lemberg) 166

„ Sketches. (Cholm) 173 i Every man looked up and grinned and raised his hand to salute 188 , A Kubanski Cossack 190 j Every day or so a tragic little procession would pass up the street that led to the prison beyond the monastery. .. 194

Civil and political prisoners at a station 216 Every day the Calea Victoria in Bucarest looks like this.. 300 A glimpse of the Serbian retreat 320 -The Pirot country—where the Serbians desperately resisted the Bulgarian advance on Nish 324 v The Serb 332 THE COVETED CITY THE English spy counted his change and remonstrated with the Italian waiter, who reluctantly produced the rest—penny by penny—whining: "Ah, signore! I am so poor man! I serve you well! You take all."

"It was a week before the declaration of war," continued the Englishman, unheeding. "The British embassy sent me to discover the whereabouts of two Turkish army corps that had gone to Asia Minor. I took a boat to Kili on the Black Sea, and travelled twelve days by cart. Whenever I got to a village I represented myself as a British commercial agent looking for new trade routes. I talked to the Turks for hours about rice, wheat, roads, and Calcutta gunnies—you have no idea what a bore Calcutta gunnies become—and then I went out to find what I could find. When I discovered something interesting I wired to the British embassy in Constantinople—in terms of Calcutta gunnies. I found the army corps; they were headed for Armenia and going fast. The declaration of war caught me at Pera. I got out travelling overland in a cart—with an American passport."

In the silence that followed, the brazen clatter of forty Poles dominated everything. They were largely women and children returning from Europe by way of Salonika, Nish, Sofia, and Bucarest—the only line then open to Warsaw. There were Russians on board, too, an Austrian or so, a German with Heidelberg schmizzes on his cheek, who talked Italian with a broad Teutonic accent and passed for a Neapolitan; a Parisian, mistress and all, a French correspondent dressed like Rudolph in La Bohème, a Bulgarian diplomat who manipulated a tortoise-shell lorgnon, and a fringe of nondescript Balkanians whose nationality it was impossible to determine.

The good ship Torino, three days out from Brindisi, was nosing up the Greek coast beyond Piraeus. As we sat at coffee we could see through the port the tawny promontory of Sunium cleaving the blue Egean, drenched in white sunlight, the ruined temple on its summit delicately yellow against great barren mountains. Off to starboard misty islands lay like blue clouds on the sea, and between them beat wide-flung, slanting double sails like the spread wings of gulls—white-and-red—on brightly colored ships with proud sterns and stems, curving amidships deep to the water, with black bull-hides stretched along their waists to keep out the spray.

Where would the war break next? Rumania was calling reserves to the colors. Italy trembled on the brink. Everybody kept up an incessant and anxious discussion as to whether Greece and Bulgaria would intervene, and on what side. For at any moment they might be cut off from home and condemned to perpetual wandering on neutral seas; they might be captured on landing and penned into concentration camps; they might be taken off the ship as alien enemies by a hostile cruiser. It was extraordinary how these people, used to comfortable lives in civilized and peaceful Europe, adapted themselves without astonishment to mediaeval conditions of travel. From plague-ridden Salonika they would take a sixty-hour railway trip in wooden third-class carriages through typhus-ridden Serbia, across the Bulgarian border where lawless bands of comitadjis were raiding and killing along the railway line; then Sofia, where the quarantine authorities penned them like cattle in the cars during the six hours of halt, and to that hostile frontier where the Rumanian and Bulgarian armies watched each other jealously across the Danube; a day or two days more to Russia, and then the dreadful uncertainty of slow military trains crawling across country threatened by the advancing Austrians.

An Armenian merchant from Constantinople was speaking now. He introduced himself as a graduate of the American mission school—Roberts College—which they say in the East produces more unscrupulous politicians and financial geniuses than any other institution in the world. Waving a cigar clutched in stubby fingers covered with jewels, he gave his personal views about the Turks, on whose religious prejudices he had battered for years.

"Yes, I am a Turkish subject," he said, "and my family for generations. They are fine people, the Turks—hospitable, kindly, and honest. I have nothing with which to reproach them, but, of course, I am for the Allies. When England holds the Dardanelles—ah, then there will be good business! Then there will be much money to be made!"

We passed a sloping headland where squat, red-tiled Turkish villages straggled up green hillsides, each with its brace of slender, gray minarets. Ahead, the muddy waters of the Gulf of Salonika opened wide against far views of long hills that crumpled into jagged mountains northward—the Balkans!

White distant walls, round towers, and a row of dazzling buildings edged the bay, and little by little a gray and yellow city grew from the barren landscape, climbing a steep hill wide-spread from the sea, a city of broad, irregular tiled roofs, round domes, spiked with a hundred minarets, encircled by the great crenellated wall that was built in the days of the Latin Kingdom—Salonika, the Eastern gate of war!

A big French war-ship was moored to the docks. Her cranes swung slowly, lowering the cannons from her turrets to the shore, where swarms of French sailors worked, hammering at the pale flames of forges.

Our Armenian friend pointed to them with a smile. "She is from the Dardanelles," he explained; "when I passed, nine days ago, she was here. And they call Salonika a neutral port!"

Offshore drifted to us the cries of Arabian porters, the shouts of the bazaar, strange minor chants of sailors from the coasts of Asia Minor and the Black Sea as they hoisted their lateen sails on ships painted at the bows with eyes, whose shape was older than history; a muezzin calling the faithful to prayer; the braying of donkeys; pipes and drums playing squealing dance-music from some latticed house far up in the Turkish quarter. Swarms of rainbow-colored boats manned by swarthy, barefooted pirates jostled each other in a roar of shrill squabbling two hundred yards away.

A skiff, carrying a big Greek flag, brought the medical officer. He bounded up the ladder shouting: "No one ashore who wants to come back. The city is quarantined—plague—" And now at our masthead the yellow flag fluttered down, and the gaycolored boats broke racing over the sea; in every boat half-naked brown men in fezzes and turbans stood urging them on with shouts, cursing furiously at their rivals. A big dory with the Russian flag astern drew under our counter; upright in it stood a giant Cossack in a long cloak of deep red, edged with fur. A high fur cap, barred on the top with red-and-gold, crowned his great head; he had silver baldrics, an enormous curved silver sword, and silver-hilted pistols in his belt. Another boat bore the Bulgarian flag, and the kavas of the Bulgarian consulate in deep blue, slung with silver ropes and tassels. We stumbled down the gangway, dragging our baggage as well as we could, and were seized by twenty rapacious hands, torn this way and that, until the strongest boatman filled his craft and shot away with a triumphant shout. The south wind was rising; as we pulled out from the lee of the ship, short yellow-green waves broke on our quarter and drenched us. Then we were paying exorbitant landing-taxes, and fighting our way to the street.

Rubber-tired, luxurious cabs, driven by turbaned Arabs, carried the veiled ladies of Turkish harems between highly modern street-cars; porters, in the immemorial breech-clout and pack-sack that Sindbad the Sailor wore, trotted by under the weight of typewriters and phonographs. So we entered Salonika, where Pierre Loti met Aziyade, where East and West do finally stand face to face.

This was the ancient Thessalonika. Here Alexander launched his fleets. She has been one of the free cities of the Roman Empire; a Byzantine metropolis second only to Constantinople, and the last stronghold of that romantic Latin Kingdom, where the broken wreck of the Crusaders clung desperately to the Levant they had won and lost. Huns and Slavs and Bulgars besieged her; Sara-cens and Franks stormed that crumbling yellow wall, massacred and looted in those twisting streets; Greeks, Albanians, Romans, Normans, Lombards, Venetians, Phoenicians, and Turks succeeded each other as her rulers, and St. Paul bored her with visits and epistles. Austria almost won Salonika in the middle of the Second Balkan War, Serbia and Greece broke the Balkan Alliance to keep her, and Bulgaria plunged into a disastrous war to gain her.

Salonika is a city of no nations and of all nations—a hundred cities, each with its separate race, customs, and language. Half-way up the steep hill he the tortuous streets and overhanging latticed balconies of the Turkish town; northwest is the tumble-down quarter of the Bulgarians; the Rumanians live below, and the Serbs nearer the bay. Grouped around the site of the Hippodrome to the east are pure Greeks, with Hellenic and Byzantine traditions unbroken for fifteen hundred years, and westward dwell the Albanians, that mysterious people who are supposed to have fled west from Asia at the breakup of the Hittite kingdoms.

But all the centre of the city is a great community of Spanish Jews expelled from Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella. They speak fifteenth-century Spanish, written in Hebrew characters, and the language of the synagogue is Spanish, too; but half of them turned Mohammedan centuries ago to please the Turks, their masters, and now that the Turk is gone they live in a maze of mystical sects, practising black magic and an ever-changing mixture of all religions.

The men still wear the flapping slip-pers, long gabardine, and tall felt hat wound with a turban. The women are dressed in rich, flowered skirts, fine white waists covered by soft silk jackets edged with fur, gold beads and earrings, and green silk bonnets to hide their hair, embroidered with pearls, heavy with brass ornaments, and crossed with bright-colored ribbons that indicate whether they are maidens, wives, or widows. Their houses, too, are different. It might be a sunny corner of the rich Spanish jueria of Toledo five hundred years ago.

All the tongues of the Western World are spoken on the narrow, tumultuous, crowded streets; Spanish is the commercial language among the natives; French is the international language; the Teutonic drive eastward has made German current; Italian is the polite language of the upper classes; Arabic and Turkish must be understood, for the servants are Arabs and Turks; Greek is universal, and Serbian, Albanian, and Bulgarian are common, for Salonika was long the port of all the Balkans.

One night we sat drinking our masti-ca, a kind of Greek absinth, in a local music-hall. First on the programme was a Greek chanteuse who sang Rumanian love-songs in Spanish; Russian dancers followed her, and a German monologist from Vienna, who spoke French. There was an American tramp comedian, who wore a set of seven vests with witty remarks on the back as he took each one off—and they were printed in Hebrew characters.

On the Place de la Liberty at sundown little marbletopped tables overflow from the cafes to the middle of the street, and there, to the music of a Greek military band, drink and promenade the picturesque riffraff that history and war has poured into Salonika. Besides Greeks, there are French, English, Russian, and Serbian officers in full uniform bearing swords, elegant young men exiled from Belgrade by war and pestilence, barbaric kavases from all the consulates—jostling the bare-legged porters, fishermen out of the "Arabian Nights," Greek priests, Mussulman hadjis, Jewish rabbis with the holy hat and reverend beard, veiled women, Turks, and German spies. Northward the Street of Liberty leads to the Tcharshee—the roaring bazaar, where, in the gloom, cross-legged Turks finger old amber and flawed emeralds and stuffs from Bokhara and Samarcand. Down the narrow, roofed-over street to the left, ablaze with clashing colors of Oriental patterns and crazy windows heaped with dusty piles of old gold and cracked turquoises, lies the Street of the Silversmiths, where bearded old men squat on high benches in their coops, hammering lumps of raw silver. Late in the afternoon a shouting tumult fills all the bazaar alleys: cries of Arab porters staggering under bales and boxes, a servant clearing the way for some rich farmer from the country, robed all in white linen, with a chain of rough gold beads around his neck, and mounted on a mule caparisoned in red and blue; lemonade-sellers in fezzes, with carved brass ewers on their backs and brass cups clanging at their waists, shopkeepers squabbling from sidewalk to sidewalk, newsboys shouting the latest extra.

Along the street that was once a part of the great Roman road from the Adriatic to the East, beyond the ruins of that marble arch carved with Greek warriors, elephants, camels, and strange peoples beyond the Indus, we lost ourselves in a maze of tortuous alleys. There we came suddenly upon a little irregular-shaped open market, squeezed between huddling shops and houses. Under enormous spreading plantain-trees was an indescribable tangle of little booths canopied with rags, where gold and blue and silver fish lay on green leaves, amid baskets of eggs, and piles of green and brown vegetables, and masses of red peppers. Bundles of chickens hung from tree-trunks, squawking feebly, pigs tethered by the legs squealed, and Macedonian farmers in white linen embroidered in colored yarns, Jewish women gleaming in silk of pale shades, Turks, and gypsies, bargained, quarrelled, stole vegetables when the marketman's back was turned—staggered from the throng with high-heaped baskets on their heads.

We ordered coffee in a dirty little Greek cafe overlooking the market. There was a Greek soldier there who stared at us for a long time, then finally came over.

"Where you from?" he asked. "What you doing?"

We told him. His face lighted up and he reached out a hand to both of us. "I been eight years in America," he said. "My brother has a candy-store in Mason City, Iowa; I been everywhere—

Kansas, Colorado, New York, Illinois—I work in a shoe-shine parlor in Springfield, Illinois."

"Are you going back?" we asked.

"Sure I go back!" he cried, grinning.

"I came here to fight in the Balkan War, and now I have only three months more to serve in the army—then I am free! I go back to the free country, the fine country, my country—America."

"Have a drink," we said.

He shook his head: "No, you have a drink with me. This is my father's restaurant. Americans always treat me good when I go to America, so I like to treat Americans. My name is Constantine Chakiris." Two other soldiers came up and sat down. They carried on an eager conversation with Constantine, and finally spoke to us, a perfect torrent of excited words.

"These boys not speak English," said Constantine; "but this man, he has six brothers in America, and this man has a sister and his father. They both say America the great, strong country—we go to America after the war."

"Do you want Greece to go to war?" we asked.

"No." He shook his head. "Macedonia don't want war; we want peace in Greece."

"What do you think of Venezelos?"

He laughed: "Venezelos wants war. If I was for Venezelos, I would be killed now. We love Venezelos; he made us free. But we don't want war. The King? Oh, we don't mind him, he is nothing."

"We in New Greece are very ignorant about politics. We have never voted yet, so how can we know about politics? Oh, I love America!" he went on ecstatically. "In America I am just like brothers with all my friends; here there is no life for a man—he can win no money." He paused for a moment. "We are Macedonians," he finished; "we are children of Alexander the Great."

As we went home through the dark street in the evening, two other Greek soldiers passed us. As they got behind us, one of them turned round. "I bet those two guys are Americans," he said.

"Hello, Bill!" we shouted.

"Hello!" They came back. "I know you are Americans. I live seven years in the States—two years more I got to serve in the army, then I go back."

"Do you fellows want Greece to go to war?" we asked.

"Sure we want Greece to go to war! We conquer Constantinople. Our King—he is named Constantine, and once Constantinople was Greek! You remember? We will go back to Constantinople with Constantine. Fight! Sure we like to fight—fight Serbia, Bulgaria, Rumania, Italy—all!"

"Where are you from?"

"We are from Sparta!"

As we strolled up and down the city day after day, scores of people shouted to us in broad American—soldiers, shopkeepers, and even newsboys. Below the hotel was a plush-upholstered shoe-shining parlor presided over by a Greek with fierce mustache.

"Hello, boys!" he said; "glad to see you. This place is a branch of George's place on Forty-Second Street, New York. George, he is my brother." And he refused to allow us to pay for our shine.

The shops were full of American shoes with knobs on the toes, American college clothes with humps of padding on the shoulders and buttons in unexpected places, American dollar watches, and American safetyrazors.

Apparently the entire masculine Greek population of Salonika had been to America. "America, the free country where you get rich! Yes, we are Greeks. We are proud to be Greeks," with a shrug; "but a man cannot live in Greece." And they are all going back when the war is over, and their military service done.

In Serbia, Bulgaria, and Rumania we met others who had been to America and caught the fever. That fierce irrational feeling called patriotism was strong in them—they loved their country and would die for it—but they could not live in it. They had tasted blood; they had experienced a civilization where the future of a new world is still an untried adventure.

THE EASTERN GATE OF WAR BY here passed the American Red Cross units, the foreign Medical Missions, on their way to typhusstricken Serbia—veteran doctors and big, robust nurses laughing at the danger and boasting what they would do; and by here the gaunt, shaking survivors drifted back to tell how their comrades died.

Still they came. While we were in Salonika three new British expeditions passed through, one hundred and nineteen strong. Fresh young girls, untrained and unequipped, without the slightest idea what they must face, explored the colorful streets and the bazaars.

"No, I never had any experience in nursing," said one; "but one just nurses, doesn't one?"

A British Royal Army Medical Corps lieutenant who heard her shook his head in despair.

"The damned fools in England to let them come!" he cried. "It is almost certain death. And they are worse than useless, you know. They are the first to fall sick, and then we have to look after them."

Of course, there was a new rumor every five minutes. Day and night ephemeral newspapers flooded the streets and cafes with huge scareheads reading:

"CONSTANTINOPLE FALLS!"

"FORTY THOUSAND ENGLISH SLAUGHTERED ON THE PENINSULA!"

"TURKISH REVOLUTIONISTS MASSACRE THE GERMANS!"

One evening an excited mob of soldiers with flags swept cheering along the sea-wall shouting: "Greece declares war!"

Spies infested the city. Germans with shaved heads and sword-cuts all over their faces pretending to be Italians; Austrians in green Tyrolean hats passing as Turks; stupid-mannered Englishmen who sat drinking and talking in the cafes, eavesdropping the conversation in six languages that went on about them; exiled Mohammedans of the Old Turk party plotting in corners, and Greek secret-service men who changed their clothes fourteen times a day and altered the shape of their mustaches.

Occasionally out of the East a French or British war-ship grew slowly from the flat world of the sea, moored at the docks, and made repairs. Then the city was full of drunken sailors day and night.

For Salonika was anything but neutral. Besides the army officers on the streets, every day saw the arrival of British ships full of ammunition for the Serbian front. Every day cars loaded with English, French, and Russian cannon disappeared into the sombre mountains northward. We saw the English gunboat on its special car begin the long journey to the Danube. And through this port went the French aeroplanes, with their hundred pilots and mecaniciens; and the British and Russian marines.

And all day long the refugees poured in; political exiles from Constantinople and Smyrna, Europeans from Turkey, Turks who feared the grand smash-up when the empire should fall, Greeks of the Levant. From Lemnos and Tenedos the refugee-boats carried the plague brought there by the Indian troops—even now it was spreading in the crowded lower quarters of the town. Always you could see pitiful processions crawling through the streets—men, women, and children with bloody feet limping beside broken-down wagons filled with the dilapidated furniture of some wretched peasant's hut. Hundreds of Greek popes from the monasteries of Asia Minor shuffled by, their threadbare black robes and high hats yellow with dust, their feet bound with rags, and all their possessions in a gunny sack over their shoulders. In trampled courtyards of old mosques, under pillared porticos painted red and blue, half-veiled women with black shawls on their heads crowded, staring vacantly into space or weeping quietly for their men, who had been taken for the army; the children played among the weed-grown tombs of the hadjis; their scanty bundles of belongings lay heaped in the corners.

Late one night we walked through the deserted quarter of docks and warehouses, so filled with shouting movement by day. From a faintly lighted window came the sound of pounding and singing, and we peered through the grimy pane. It was a water-front saloon, a low-vaulted room with a floor of hard-packed earth, rough table and stools, piles of black bottles, barrel-ends and one smoking lamp hung crazily from the ceiling. At the table sat eight men, whining a wavering Oriental song, and beating time with their glasses. Suddenly one caught sight of our faces at the window; they halted, leaped to their feet. The door flew open—hands reached out and pulled us in.

"Entrez! Pasen Ustedes! Herein! Herein!" shouted the company, crowding eagerly about as we entered the room. A short, bald-headed man with a wart on his nose pumped our hands up and down, babbling in a mixture of languages: "To drink! To drink! What will you have, friends?"

"But we invite you—" I began.

"This is my shop! Never shall a stranger pay in my shop! Wine? Beer? Maslica?"

"Who are you?" asked the others. "French? English? Ah—Americans! I have a cousin—his name Georgopoulos—he live in California. You know him?"

One spoke English, another harsh maritime French, a third Neapolitan, a fourth Levantine Spanish, and still another pidgin-German; all knew Greek, and the strange patois of the Mediterranean sailor. The fortunes of war had swept them from the four corners of the Middle World into this obscure backwater on the Salonika docks.

"It is strange," said the man who spoke English. "We-met here by chance—not one of us has ever known the other before. And we are all seven carpenters. I am a Greek from Kili on the Black Sea, and he is a Greek, and he, and he—from Ephesus, and Erzeroum, and Scutari. This man is an Italian—he lives in Aleppo, in Syria—and this one a Frenchman of Smyrna. Last night we were sitting here just like now, and he looked in at the window like you did."

The seventh carpenter, who had not spoken, said something that sounded like a German dialect. The proprietor translated:

"This man is Armenian. He says all his family is killed by the Turks. He tries to tell you in the German he learned working on the Bagdad Railway!"

"Back there," cried the Frenchman, "I leave my wife and two kids! I go away hiding on a fisherboat"

"God knows where is my brother." The Italian shook his head. "The soldiers took him. We could not both escape."

Now the master of the house brought liquor, and we raised our glasses to his beaming countenance.

"He is like that," the Italian explained with gestures. "We have no money. He gives us food and drink, and we sleep here on the floor, poor refugees. God will certainly reward his charity!"

"Yes. Yes. God will reward him," assented the others, drinking. The proprietor crossed himself elaborately, after the complicated fashion of the Orthodox Church.

"God knows I am fond of company," he said. "And one cannot turn away destitute men in times like these, especially men of pleasing talents. Besides, a carpenter gains good wages when he works, and then I shall be repaid."

"Do you want Greece to go to war?" we asked.

"No!" cried some; others moodily shook their heads.

"It is like this," the English-speaking Greek said slowly: "This war has driven us from our homes and our work. Now there is no work for a carpenter. War is a tearing down and not a building up. A carpenter is for building up—" He translated to the silent audience, and they growled applause.

"But how about Constantinople?"

"Constantinople for Greece! Greek Constantinople!" shouted two of the carpenters. But the others broke into violent argument.

The Italian rose and lifted his glass. "Eviva Constantinople Internazionale!" he cried. With a cheer everybody rose "Constantinople Internazionale!"

"Come," said the proprietor, "a song for the strangers!"

"What was that you were singing when we came?" demanded Robinson.

"That was an Arab song. Now let us sing a real Turkish song!" And throwing back their heads, the company opened their noses in a whining wail, tapping with stiff fingers on the table while the glasses leaped and jingled.

"More to drink!" cried the excited innkeeper. "What is song without drink?"

"God will reward him!" murmured the seven carpenters in voices husky with emotion.

The Italian had a powerful tenor voice; he sang "La donna e mobile," in which the others joined with Oriental improvisations. An American song was called for, and Robinson and I obliged with "John Brown's Body"—which was encored four times.

Later dancing displaced music. In the flickering light of the fast-expiring lamp the proprietor led a stamping trio in the kolo, racial dance of all the Balkan peoples. Great boots clumped stiffly down, arms waved, fingers snapped, ragged clothes fluttered in brown shadow and yellow radiance.... Followed an Arab measure, all swaying bodies and syncopated gliding steps, and slow twirlings with closed eyes. At an early hour of the morning we were giving the company lessons in the "boston," and the turkey trot.... And so ended the adventure of the Seven Carpenters of Salonika.

Toward evening we would wander through the shouting Tcharshee, past the Prefecture—where the sentries wore white ballet-skirts and turned-up slippers ornamented with green pom-poms—and climb the steep, crooked streets of the Turkish town. Past the little pink mosque on the corner, with its tall cypress and gray minaret; through streets overhung with shahnichars, behind which mysterious women tittered and rustled—no doubt all mysteriously beautiful. There were glimpses into the interior of hans, long trains of laden donkeys entering and leaving, pack-saddles piled in corners, Turks and peasants sitting crosslegged in the shade over their coffee. Sharp, black shadows fell across the cobbled courtyard, and women passed brightly into sunlight carrying painted earthen water-jars on their shoulders. Beyond was the Turkish market, with its leisurely, quiet crowd. Along the sides of a street thronged with booths of meat-sellers, the baskets of the fish-merchants, heaps of vegetables, and droves of chickens, were the cafes where the traders sat smoking their chibouks. Here one saw Hadjis, holy men in green turbans who had made the pilgrimage to Mecca, dancing dervishes in tall gray hats and long, flaring robes of ash-color, the dull reds and sheepskins and cream-colored linens of farmers from the villages, and beardless eunuchs following veiled ladies of the seraglio.

Still farther on the cobbled street rose sharply into tranquillity. Here the latticed windows whispered, and only the occasional donkey of a street vender passed—rarely women with hidden faces going to the fountain with jugs on their hips. Unexpectedly, the climbing way broadened out in an irregular little open place, shaded by an immense and ancient tree, where two or three tiny cafes sheltered each its meditative, smoking Turks, and others squatted along the curb, speaking slowly with soft voices. They looked at us incuriously, indifferently, and turned away again to their own affairs.

Still upward, until the great yellow wall loomed overhead, all its deep crenellations sharp outlined against the warm afternoon blue. We passed through a breach where the inhabitants had for centuries taken the stone for their houses, and looked out upon the summits of green hills, far-lying meadows where sheep pastured. At the edge of the world northward loomed the purple mountains, behind which war and pestilence raged. Nearer at hand, slanting black gypsy tents were scattered, and in a far green pocket of earth leaping barelegged men in red trousers and yellow turbans played ball. Tinkling mule-trains, with linen-clad peasants strolling behind, moved along faint tracks to unseen villages somewhere over the rim of the horizon.

From a little hut built against the base of the great wall came an old Turk. He bowed to us, and returning, brought two wooden chairs. We saw him no more until we rose to go away, when he reappeared, bowed to us, and took the chairs. I tried to give him some money; he only shook his head, smiling, and said something we didn't understand....

Now the sun low in the west flooded the green, cloudless sky with waves of yellow light. We went along a beaten path that wound between miserable houses built of flints, and came to an open space where the magnificent panorama of the tumbled city fell away to the sea. Dull-red plains of roofs, jutting balconies, round white domes, spires, bulbous Greek towers, minarets spiring delicately beside lofty cypresses; the squealing roar of an Oriental town mounting from hidden streets. At the water's edge stood the round white tower of the Venetian wall, and beyond spread a sea the color of cloudy Chinese jade, spotted with slanting sails, yellow, white, and red. Southward, barring the gulf, the rugged Greek mainland towered into the mighty range of Mount Olympus, covered with snow and ever veiled with a cloud. To the right, the golden city-wall plunged magnificently down into the valley, and up the slope of the hill, dwindling westward for miles. The silver Vardar wound flatly through its willowy plain; farther yet were the swamps where Bulgarian comitadjis, fighting to make Macedonia free, once held at bay a Turkish army corps; and at the far end of vision, the sharp Thes-salian mountains.

Dusk fell swiftly. For a moment the high white crest of Olympus glowed an unearthly pink, slowly fading. In the deep sky there were suddenly millions of stars; a crescent moon brightened half-way up the night. Below us, the muezzins came out on the parapets of seventeen minarets with tiny yellow lanterns, and pulled them jiggling up the halyards. From where we stood we could hear their high dissonant voices shouting the shrill call of the faithful to prayer:

"God is great! God is great! God is great! God is great! I bear witness that there is no other god but God! I bear witness that there is no other god but God! I bear witness that Mohammed is the apostle of God! I bear witness that Mohammed is the apostle of God! Come to prayer, come to prayer! Come to salvation, come to salvation! Prayer is better than sleep...."

Now the Turkish town shrinks, and the quiet flow of Turkish life weakens, year by year, before the mounting flood of busy, inquisitive Greeks. Mosque after mosque falls to ruin, and every month sees voiceless and deserted some minaret where the muezzin called to prayer each sunset for centuries. Mecca has become distant and powerless, and whatever the result of the war, Stamboul will never again rule Salonika; the Turks of Salonika are dying out. And the city itself is dying—in the loss of her hinterland, in the fevers that sweep her periodically from the low-lying Vardar, the silt that slowly chokes her magnificent harbor, the voracious channel of the river that already eats into the town. Soon Salonika will no longer be worth a war.

II SERBIA THE COUNTRY OF DEATH WE rubbed ourselves from head to foot with camphorated oil, put kerosene on our hair, filled our pockets with moth-balls, and sprinkled naphthaline through our baggage; and boarded a train so saturated with formalin that our eyes and lungs burned as with quicklime. The Americans from the Standard Oil office in Salonika strolled down to bid us a last farewell.

"Too bad," said Wiley. "So young, too. Do you want the remains shipped home, or shall we have you buried up there?"

These were the ordinary precautions of travellers bound for Serbia, the country of the typhus—abdominal typhus, recurrent fever, and the mysterious and violent spotted fever, which kills fifty per cent of its victims, and whose bacillus no man had then discovered. Most doctors thought it was carried by clothing lice, but the British R. A. M. C. lieutenant who travelled with us was sceptical.

"I've been up there three months," he said, "and I've long ago stopped taking any precautionary measures whatever except a daily bath. As for the lice—one gets used to spending a quiet evening picking them off one." He snorted at the naphthaline. "They're really quite fond of it, you know. The truth about the typhus is that no one knows anything about it at all, except that about one-sixth of the Serbian nation is dead of it...."

Already the warm weather and the cessation of the spring rains had begun to check the epidemic—and the virus was weaker. Now there were only a hundred thousand sick in all Serbia, and only a thousand deaths a day—besides cases of the dreadful posttyphus gangrene. In February it must have been ghastly—hundreds dying and delirious in the mud of the streets for want of hospitals.

The foreign medical missions had suffered heavily. Half a hundred priests succumbed after giving absolution to the dying. Out of the four hundred odd doctors with which the Serbian army began the war, less than two hundred were left. And the typhus was not all. Smallpox, scarlet fever, scarlatina, diphtheria raged along the great roads and in far villages, and already there were cases of cholera, which was sure to spread with the coming of the summer in that devastated land; where battle-fields, villages, and roads stank with the lightly buried dead, and the streams were polluted with the bodies of men and horses.

Our lieutenant belonged to the British Army Medical Mission, sent to fight the cholera. He was dressed in full service uniform, and carried a huge sword which got between his legs and embarrassed him frightfully.

"I don't know what to do with the bally thing," he cried, hurling it into a corner. "We don't wear swords in the army any more. But we have to out here, because the Serbians won't believe you're an officer unless you carry a sword...."

As we crawled slowly up between barren hills along the yellow torrent of the Vardar, he told us how the English had persuaded the Serbian Government to stop all train service for a month, in order to prevent the spread of disease; then they ordered sanitary improvements in the filthy towns, compelled anticholera vaccination, and began to disinfect whole sections of the population. The Serbians sneered—these English were evidently cowards. When Colonel Hunter, unable to secure decent quarters, threatened the authorities that if one of his men died of typhus he would abandon Serbia, a storm of irony burst. Colonel Hunter was a coward! And the Americans were cowards, too, when, with half their units infected, they abandoned Gievgieli. To the Serbians, the taking of preventive measures was a proof of timidity. They regarded the immense ravages of the epidemic with a sort of gloomy pride—as mediaeval Europe regarded the Black Death.

The gorge of the Vardar, as if it were a sterile frontier between Greek Macedonia and the high valleys of New Serbia, broadened out into a wide valley rimmed with stony hills, beyond which lay mountains still higher, with an occasional glimpse of an abrupt snow peak. From every canyon burst rapid mountain streams. In this valley the air was hot and moist; irrigation ditches, lined with great willows, struck off from the river, across fields of young tobacco-plants, acres upon acres of mulberry-trees, and ploughed land of heavy, rich clay that looked like cotton country. Here every field, every shelf of earth, was cultivated. Higher up, on bare slopes among the rocks, sheep and goats pastured, tended by bearded peasants with huge crooks, clad in sheepskin coats, spinning wool and silk on wooden distaffs. Irregular, white, red-roofed villages meandered along rutted spaces where squat little oxen and black water-buffaloes dragged creaking carts. Here and there was the galleried konak of some wealthy Turk of the old regime, set in yellow-green towering willows, or flowering almond-trees heavy with scent; and over the tumbled little town a slender gray minaret, or the dome of a Greek church.

All sorts of people hung about the stations—men turbaned and fezzed and capped with conical hats of brown fur, men in Turkish trousers, or in long shirts and tights of creamy homespun linen, their leather vests richly worked in colored wheels and flowers, or in suits of heavy brown wool ornamented with patterns of black braid, high red sashes wound round and round their waists, leather sandals sewed to a circular spout on the toe and bound to the calf with leather ribbons wound to the knees; women with the Turkish yashmak and bloomers, or in leather and woollen jackets embroidered in bright colors, waists of the raw silk they weave in the villages, embroidered linen underskirts, black aprons worked in flowers, heavy overskirts woven in vivid bars of color and caught up behind, and yellow or white silk kerchiefs on their heads. Many wore a black kerchief—the only sign of mourning. And always and everywhere gypsies—the men in a kind of bright turban, the women with gold pieces for earrings and patches and scraps of gay rags for dresses, barefooted—shuffling along the roads beside their caravans, or lounging about the rakish black tents of their camps.

A tall, bearded man in black introduced himself in French as a Serbian secret-service officer whose job was to keep us under observation. Once a dapper young officer came aboard and questioned him, nodding to us. The other responded.

"Dobral Good!" he said, clicking his heels and saluting.

"That station," remarked the secret-service man as the train moved on again, "is the frontier. We are now in Serbia."

We caught a glimpse of several big, gaunt men lounging on the platform, rifles with fixed bayonets slung at their shoulders, without any uniform except the soldier's kepi.

"What would you?" shrugged our friend, smiling. "We Serbians have no longer any uniforms. We have fought four wars in three years—the First and Second Balkan Wars, the Albanian revolt, and now this one.... For three years our soldiers have not changed their clothes."

Now we were passing along a narrow field planted with small wooden crosses, that might have been vine poles, spaced about three feet apart; they marched beside the train for five minutes.

"The typhus cemetery of Gievgieli," he said laconically. There must have been thousands of those little crosses, and each marked a grave!

There came in sight a great, tramped-down space on a hillside beyond, honeycombed with burrows leading into the brown earth, and humped into round hutches of heaped-up mud. Men crawled in and out of the holes, ragged, dirty fellows in every variety of half-uniform, with rifle-belts crisscrossed over their breasts like Mexican revolutionists. Between were stacked rifles, and there were cannon with ox-yoke limbers and half a hundred springless ox-carts ranged along the side, while farther on the hobbled oxen grazed. Below the mud huts, at the bottom of the hill, men were drinking from the yellow river that poured down from a score of infected villages up the valley. Around a fire squatted twenty or more, watching the carcass of a sheep turn in the flames.

"This regiment has come to guard the frontier," explained our friend. "It was here that the Bulgarian comitadjis tried to break through and cut the railroad last week. At any moment they might come again.... Is the Bulgarian Government responsible, or did the Austrians pay them? One can never tell, in the Balkans."

And now, every quarter mile we passed a rude but made of mud and twigs, before which stood a ragged, hollow-cheeked soldier, filthy and starved-looking, but with his rifle at present arms. All over Serbia one saw these men—the last desperate gleanings of the country's manhood—who live in the mud, with scanty food and miserable clothing, guarding the long-deserted railroad tracks.

At first there seemed no difference between this country and Greek Macedonia. The same villages, a little more unkempt—tiles gone from the roofs, white paint chipped from the walls; the same people, but fewer of them, and those mostly women, old men, and children. But soon things began to strike one. The mulberry-trees were neglected, the tobacco-plants were last year's, rotting yellow; corn-stalks stood spikily in weedy fields unturned for twelve months or more. In Greek Macedonia, every foot of arable land was worked; here only one field out of ten showed signs of cultivation. Occasionally we saw two oxen, led by a woman in bright yellow head-dress and brilliantly colored skirt, dragging a wooden plough carved from a twisted oak limb, which a soldier guided, his rifle slung from his shoulder.

The secret-service man pointed to them. "All the men of Serbia are in the army—or dead—and all the oxen were taken by the government to draw the cannon and the trains. But since December, when we drove the Austrians out, there has been no fighting. So the government sends the soldiers and the oxen over Serbia, wherever they are wanted, to help with the ploughing."

Sometimes, in details like these, there flashed before our imaginations a picture of this country of the dead: with two bloody wars that swept away the flower of its youth, a two months' hard guerilla campaign, then this fearful struggle with the greatest military power on earth, and a devastating plague on top of that. Yet from the ruins of a whole people, imperial ambitions were already springing, which might one day threaten all southern Europe.

Gievgieli shares with Valievo the distinction of being the worst plague-spot in Serbia. Trees, station, and buildings were splashed and spattered with chloride of lime, and armed sentries stood guard at the fence, where a hundred ragged people pressed murmuring—for Gievgieli was quarantined. We stared through the fence at a wide, rough street of cobbles and mud, flanked by one-story buildings white with disinfectant; at almost every door flapped a black flag, the sign of death in the house.

A stout, mustached man in a dirty collar, spotted clothing, and a smutty Panama pulled down over his eyes stood on the platform, surrounded by a dense circle of soldiers. He held a small wild flower on high, and addressed the secret-service man volubly and excitedly.

"See!" he cried. "This flower I found in that field beyond the river. It is very curious! I do not know this flower! It is evidently of the family of the orchidal!" He scowled and fixed the secret-service man with a menacing eye. "Is it not of the family of theorchidas?"

"It has certain characteristics, indeed," said the other timidly. "This tongue.... But the pistil!"

The fat man shook the flower. "Nonsense! It is of the family of the orchida!"

The soldiers round about broke into a hum of argument: "Da! Orchidal!" "Ne je orchida!" "But it is evidently an orchid!" "What do you know of orchids, George Georgevitch? At Ralya, where you come from, they haven't even grass!" There was a laugh at this. Above it rose the fat man's voice, insistent, passionate: "I tell you it is an orchid! It is a new kind of orchid! It is unknown to the science of botany!"

Robinson caught the infection of the argument. "Orchid?" he said to me with a sneer. "Of course it's not an orchid!"

"It is an orchid!" I returned hotly. "It is formed very like the lady's-slippers that we see in American woods"

The fat man wheeled around and erupted into broken English, glaring at us. "Yes, yes!" he said eagerly. "The same. Are you Americans? I have been in America. I have tramped through Kansas and Missouri, working on the farms of wheat. I have walked through the Panhan'le of Texas, with work at the cattle-ranch. I am on foot gone through Seattle to San Francisco, to Sacramento, crossing the Sierras and the desert to Yuma in Arizona—you know Yuma? No? I am studying all kind of farming from firsthand for to apply these experiences to Serbian farms. My name is Lazar Obichan. I am an Agro-Geolog, and secretary in Department of Agriculture in government at Belgrade. Yes." He cleared his throat, waved his elbows to make a space in the crowd, and seized us each by a lapel.

"I am sent here to study soil, climate, and crop conditions of New Serbia. I am an expert. I have invented a new method to tell what can be grown in any soil, in any country. It is automatic, simple, can be appli' by anybody—a new science. Listen! You give me the humidity—I put her there." He poked Robinson stiffly in the shoulder-blade. "Then you give me the mean temperatoor—I put him there." A jab near Robinson's kidney. "From humidity I draw a vertical line straight down, isn't it? From mean temperatoor I draw horizontal line straight across." He suited the action to the word, furrowing the artist's diaphragm. His voice rose. "Until the two lines meet! And the point where they meet, there is the figure which gives the evaporation for one day!" He poked us simultaneously in the chest to emphasize each word, and repeated: "The Evaporation for One Day!" He threw both hands up and beamed upon us, pausing to allow this to sink in. We were impressed.

"But that is not all I have in my mind," he went on heavily. "There is a vast commercial and financial scheme—immense! Listen! After this war Serbia she will need much money, much foreign capitals. From where will he come? From England? No. England will need all at home. France and Russia will be absolute exhausted. No capitals from Europe. Where then? I tell you. From America. America is rich. I have been in her and I know how rich. Listen! We will establish a Serbian-American Bank with American capitals and American managers. It will sit in Belgrade. It will lend money to Serbians—big profit! Serbian law allows to charge twelve per cent interest—twelve per cent! It will loan to farmers at big interest. It will buy land from poor people, split up in small pieces and sell back at four hundred per cent profit. Serbians poor now, will sell land cheap—but Serbians need land, must have land. We are bankrupted here now—you can buy—how do you say?—you can buy all Serbia for a music! Then these bank, she will open in Belgrade a permanent exhibition of American products and take orders—American shoes, American machines, American cloth—and in New York she will open one of Serbian products and take orders. Make money—big! You shall write about in your papers. If you have capitals put in these bank!"

On the station a bell was ringing. The stationmaster blew a horn, the engine whistled, the train began to move. We tore our lapels from Mr. Obichan's thumbs and ran. He raced along with us, still talking.

"Serbia is very rich country in natural resources," he shouted. "Here there is soil for cotton, tobacco, silk—very fine alluvial lands. Southern slopes of hills for vineyards! Farther up in mountains wheat, plums, peaches, apples. In the Machva prunes—" We swung on board. "Minerals—" he yelled after us. "Gold—copper—Labor cheap—" And then we lost his voice. Later on we asked a Serbian official about him.

"Lazar Obichan?" he said. "Yes, we know him. He is under observation—suspected of selling military secrets to the Austrian Government!"

Late in the afternoon we halted on a siding to let a military train pass—twelve open flat cars packed with soldiers, in odds and ends of uniforms, wrapped in clashing and vividly colored blankets. It had begun to rain a little. A gypsy fiddler played wildly, holding his one-stringed violin before him by the throat, which was carved rudely to represent a horse's head; and about him lay the soldiers, singing the newest ballad of the Austrian defeat:

"The Swabos came all the way to Ralya,
But no further came they—Hey, Kako to?
Yoy, Sashto to?

"They won't soon forget Rashko Pol,
For there they met the Serbs!
Hey, how was that?
Yoy, why was that?
Swabos—Austrians.

"And now the Swabos know
How the Serbs receive intruders!
Hey, Tako to!
Yoy, that was how I!"

Every regiment has two or three gypsies, who march with the troops, playing the Serbian fiddle or the bagpipes, and accompany the songs that are composed incessantly by the soldiers—love-songs, celebrations of victory, epic chants. And all through Serbia they are the musicians of the people, travelling from one country festa to another, playing for dancing and singing. Strange substitution! The gypsies have practically replaced the old-time travelling bards, the goosslari, who transmitted from generation to generation through the far mountain valleys the ancient national epics and ballads. And yet they alone in Serbia have no vote. They have no homes, no villages, no land—only their tents and their dilapidated caravans.

We tossed some packages of cigarettes among the soldiers in the cars. For a moment they didn't seem to understand. They turned them over and over, opened them, stared at us with heavy, slow, flat faces. Then light broke—they smiled, nodding to us. "Fala" they said gently. "Falalepol Thanks beautifully!"

THE WAR CAPITAL NISH. We took a tumble-down cab—whose bottom-board immediately fell out—attached to two dying horses and driven by a bandit in a high fur cap, and jolted up a wide street paved with mud and wide-set sharp cobblestones. Round about the city the green "hills rose, beautiful with new leaves and with every flowering fruit-tree, and over the wide-flung Turkish roofs, and the few mean plaster buildings in the European style, loomed the bulbous Greek domes of the cathedral. Here and there was the slender spire of a minaret, crisscrossed with telephone-wires. The street opened into a vast square, a sea of mud and cobblestones bounded by wretched huts, across which marched steel poles carrying hundreds of wires and huge modern arc-lights. At one side an ox lay on his back, feet clewed up to a wooden beam, while peasants shod him with solid iron plates, as they had done it for half a thousand years.

Austrian prisoners in uniform wandered freely everywhere, without a guard. Some drove wagons, others dug ditches, and hundreds loitered up and down in idleness. We learned that by paying fifty denars to the government, you could have one for a servant. All the legations and consulates were manned with them. And the prisoners were glad to be servants, for there was no decent place for them to live, and scanty food. Now and then an Austrian officer passed along, in full uniform and with his sword.

"Escape?" said one government official we interrogated. "No, they do not try. The roads are metres deep in mud, the villages are depopulated and full of disease, there is no food.... It is difficult enough to travel by train in Serbia—on foot it would be impossible. And there are the guards all along the frontier...."

We passed a big hospital where pale prisoners leaned from the windows upon dirty blankets, dragged themselves in and out of the doors, and lay propped up on piles of drying mud along the road. These were only survivors; for out of the sixty thousand Austrians captured in the war, twelve thousand were already dead of typhus.

Beyond the square was the street again, between rough one-story houses, and we were in the marketplace. A dull roar rose from the haggling of hundreds of peasants in ten different national costumes—homespun linen embroidered with flowers, high fur hats, fezzes, turbans, and infinite varieties and modifications of Turkish trousers. Pigs squealed, hens squawked; underfoot were heaped baskets of eggs and herbs and vegetables and red peppers; majestic old men in sheepskins shuffled along with lambs in their arms. Here was the centre of the town. There were two or three restaurants and foul-smelling cafes, the dingy Hotel Orient, the inevitable American shoe store, and amid cheap little shops, sudden windows ablaze with expensive jewelry and extravagant women's hats.

Along the sidewalks elbowed a multitude of strangely assorted people: gypsies, poverty-stricken peasants, gendarmes with great swords, in red and blue uniforms, tax-collectors dressed like generals, also with swords, smart army officers hung with medals, soldiers in filthy tatters, their feet bound with rags—soldiers limping, staggering on crutches, without arms, without legs, discharged from the overcrowded hospitals still blue and shaking from the typhus—and everywhere the Austrian prisoners. Government officials hurried by with portfolios under their arms. Fat Jewish army contractors hobnobbed with political hangers-on over maculate cafe tables. Women government clerks, wives and mistresses of officers, society ladies, shouldered the peasant women in their humped-up gay skirts and high-colored socks. The government from Belgrade had taken refuge in Nish, and a mountain village of twenty thousand inhabitants had become a city of one hundred and twenty thousand—not counting those who died.

For the typhus had swept the town, where people were living six and ten in a room, until everywhere the black flags flapped in long, sinister vistas, and the windows of the cafes were plastered with black paper death-notices.

We crossed the muddy Nishava River on the bridge which leads to the heavy, arabesqued gate of the ancient Turkish citadel, which was Roman before the Turks, and where Constantine the Great was born. On the grass along the foot of the great wall sprawled hundreds of soldiers, sleeping, scratching themselves, stripping and searching their bodies for lice, tossing and twisting in fever. Everywhere about Nish, wherever there was a spot of worn grass, the miserable people clustered, picking vermin from each other.

The stench of the city was appalling. In the side streets open sewers trickled down among the cobbles. Some sanitary measures had been taken—such as the closing of cafes and restaurants from two o'clock until six every day in order to disinfect them—but still it was an even chance of typhus if you stayed in a hotel or public building. Luckily the hospitable American vice-consul, Mr. Young, took us in at the consulate and introduced us at the Diplomatic Club, which had dining-rooms over an abandoned restaurant, and where good food was to be got when half the town was starving. The entrance was through a pigsty, after stepping across an open sewer; and when you opened the club-room door, your astonished eyes encountered tables, decorated with flowers and covered with silver and snowy linen, and a head waiter in smart evening dress, an Austrian prisoner by the name of Fritz, who had been head waiter at the Carlton in London before the war. To see the British minister sail majestically past the pigsty and mount the club stairs as if it were Piccadilly was a thing worth coming miles for.

Such was Nish, as we first saw it. Two weeks later we returned, after the rains had altogether ceased, and the hot sun had dried the streets. It was a few days after the feast of St. George, which marks the coming of the spring in Serbia. On that day all Serbia rises at dawn and goes out into the woods and fields, gathering flowers and dancing and singing and feasting all day. And even here, in this filthy, overcrowded town, with the tragic sadness of war and pestilence over every house, the streets were a gay sight. The men peasants had changed their dirty heavy woollens and sheepskins for the summer suit of embroidered dazzling linen. All the women wore new dresses and new silk kerchiefs, decorated with knots of ribbon, with leaves and flowers—even the ox-yokes and the oxen's heads were bound with purple lilac branches. Through the streets raced mad young gypsy girls in Turkish trousers of extravagant and gorgeous colors, their bodices gleaming with gold braid, gold coins hung in their ears. And I remember five great strapping women with mattocks over their shoulders, who marched singing down the middle of the road to take their dead men's places in the work of the fields.

We were received by Colonel Soubotitch, chief of the Red Cross, in his headquarters. He described the terrible lack of all medical necessities in Serbia, and painted us a graphic picture of people dying in the streets of Nish only a month before. I noticed a handsome peasant blanket on his bed.

"My mother wove that for me," he said simply, "in the village where I live. She is a peasant. We are all peasants in Serbia—that is our pride. Voyvoda Putnik, commander-in-chief of the army, is a poor man; his father was a peasant. Voyvoda Michitch, who won the great battle that hurled the Austrian army from our country, is a peasant. Many of the deputies to the Skouptchina, our parliament, are peasants, who sit there in peasant dress." He stared at the bed. "And on that bed, on that very blanket which you so admired, I stood here where I now stand and watched my son die of the typhus, two months ago. What will you? We must do our duty...."

He threw back his shoulders with a visible effort. "So you want to see a typhus hospital? Ah, they are not interesting now. The worst is over. But I will give you a letter to Stanoievitch, at Chere Kula."

We drove to Chere Kula, a mile out of town, late one sombre afternoon in the pouring rain. The name is Turkish, meaning "Mound of Skulls"; it is literally a tower of skulls of Serbian warriors, erected near the site of a great battle fought more than a century ago, as a monument to the Turkish victory. Lieutenant Stanoievitch, in command of the hospital, unlocked the Greek chapel which the Serbians have built over the holy spot. In the dim light it loomed there, completely filling the chapel, a great round tower of clay with a few grinning heads still embedded in it, and draped with wreaths of faded flowers.

Around this sinister memorial were grouped the brick buildings of the typhus hospital, and the wooden barracks where the overflow was lodged. The wind set our way, carrying the stench of bodies sweating with fever, of sick men eating, of the rotting of flesh. We entered a barrack, along whose walls cots lay touching each other, and in the feeble light of two lanterns we could see the patients writhing in their dirty blankets, five and six crowded into two beds. Some sat up, apathetically eating; others lay like the dead; still others gave short, grunting moans, or shouted suddenly in the grip of delirium. The hospital orderlies, who slept in the same room, were all Austrian prisoners.

"I have been put in charge of this hospital only three days," said the lieutenant. "Before I came it was pretty bad. Now we have only twenty deaths a day. There are eight hundred patients—you see, we have no room for even these."

We passed through fetid ward after fetid ward, smelling of decomposition and death, until we were wrung with the helplessness of these big men, and our stomachs were turned with the stench.

Later, we dined with Stanoievitch and his staff of young doctors and medical students. The good red wine of the country went around, and in a gay and lively argument about the war we forgot for a moment the poor devils dying on the other side of

A HOSPITAL AT NISH. In the feeble light of two lanterns we could see the patients writhing in their dirty blankets, the wall. Stanoievitch, flushed with wine, was boasting of how the Serbians had smashed the Austrian army.

"What are these French and English doing?" he cried impatiently. "Why do they not beat the Germans? What they need there are a few Serbians to show them how to make war. We Serbians know that all that is needed is the willingness to die—and the war would soon be over..." TOWARD THE FRONT NEXT morning early we were on our way to Kragujevatz, the army headquarters. Our train was loaded with ammunition and American flour for the army at the front, and we carried five cars full of soldiers, in sheepskins, peasant dress, and Austrian uniforms picked up in the rout of December—one man even wore a German casque. They sang an interminable ballad to a minor air, about how old King Peter went to the trenches during the battle of Kolubara River:

"Krai Peter rose from his bed one morning'
"And said to his dearly beloved son, Prince Alexander,
'O brave, courageous Prince, my son (Who leads so well the army of Serbia,
The Swabos have passed Kroupaign,—
Their powerful hosts, like the rushing Morava,
Have passed Valievo....
I shall go forth to conquer or to die with them I

He girt upon him his bright sword...."

The railway line paralleled the Morava River. Here all was green, and in the black loam of the fields women were ploughing with oxen, and winding wool on distaffs as they ploughed. White, low, tiled houses, their balconies overhung with graceful Turkish arches, their corners painted in colored lozenges, lay hidden amid plum and apple trees in bloom. Beyond them stretched meadows under water, where thousands of frogs made a gigantic croaking chorus, audible above the roaring of the train—for the Morava was in flood. We passed Teshitza, Bagrdan, Dedrevatz, Lapovo, smelling of formalin and spattered with sinister white—pest-holes all.

At Kragujevatz we were met by a delegate from the Press Bureau, erstwhile lecturer on comparative literature at the University of Belgrade. He was a large-featured, absent-minded young man with fat knees incased in pearl riding-breeches, a bright-green felt hat over one ear, and a naughty twinkle in his eye. Within two hours we were calling him "Johnson," which is a literal translation of his name.

Johnson knew every one, and every one knew him. He kept up a running scandalous comment on the people that we passed, and would halt the cab for long periods while he got out and exchanged the latest spicy gossip with some friend. Finally, we would shout to him: "For Heaven's sake, Johnson, hurry up!"

"Excuse me, sair!" he would respond solemnly. "You must have patience. Thees is war-time!"

We found the chief of the Press Bureau, former professor of public law at the University of Belgrade, hard at work reading a novel of George Meredith. Johnson explained that the Press Bureau was a very important and active organization.

"We make here many jokes about prominent people, epigrams, and rhymes. For instance, one of the conspirators in the assassination of the Archduke Ferdinand was an officer of the Serbian army during the retreat. He feared that he would be recognized if taken prisoner, so he shaved his beard. In the Press Bureau we have made a sonnet about him, in which we said that it was in vain to shave his beard when he could not shave his prominent nose! Yes, sair. In the Press Bureau we make sometimes two hundred sonnets a day."

Johnson was a dramatist of note. He had transplanted to the Serbian stage the Comedie Rosse of the Theatre Antoine, and had been ostracized by respectable society. "Because," he explained, "my play was obscene. But it was true to Serbian life, and that is the ideal of art, don't you think?"

Johnson was saturated with European culture, European smartness, cynicism, modernism; yet scratch the surface and you found the Serb; the strong, virile stock of a young race not far removed from the half-savagery of a mountain peasantry, intensely patriotic and intensely independent.

But many Serbian "intellectuals" are like the city of Belgrade, where only three years ago the peasants drove their creaking ox-carts along unpaved streets deep in mud, between one-story houses like the houses of Nish—and which now puts on the buildings, the pavements, the airs and vices of Paris and Vienna. They affect modern art, modern music, the tango and fox-trot. They ridicule the songs and costumes of the peasants.

Sometimes these affectations are laughable. We rode during all one day on horseback over the battlefield of Goutchevo Mountain with a young officer—also of the university faculty—who had lived for three years the life of a fighting nomad, such as no Englishman, Frenchman, or German could have endured. He had gone through the terrible retreat, and still more terrible attack of that winter campaign, sleeping out in the rain or in huts full of vermin, eating the coarse food of the peasants or no food, and thriving on it.

"I am so fond of the country," he said as we rode along. "It is so pastoral, don't you think? I am always reminded of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony when I am in the country." He whistled a few bars abstractedly. "No, I made a mistake. That is the Third, isn't it?"

We discovered afterward that his father was a peasant, and all his forebears since the Serbs first came down from the plains of Hungary had been peasants, and had lived in this "country" which reminded him only of Beethoven!

And in Serbia they are still sensitive about Shaw's "Arms and the Man."...

We dined at the general staff mess, in the rude throne-room of the palace of Milan Obrenovitch, first of the Serbian kings; his gaudy red-plush-and-gilt throne still stands there, and on the walls are pictures of Milosh Obilich and the other heroes of Serbia's stormy history, and of the Serbian comitadji leaders who died by the hands of the Turks in Macedonia in the years before the Balkan War.

"This palace is one of our oldest national monuments," said Johnson. "It was built more than fifty years ago."

Astonishing, the youth of the kingdom of Serbia. Less than a hundred years have passed since she emerged as a free state from five centuries of Turkish domination—and in that time what a history she has had!

The secret dream of every Serb is the uniting of all the Serbian peoples in one great empire: Hungarian Croatia, identical in race and spoken language—Dalmatia, home of Serbian literature—Bosnia, fountain-head of Serbian poetry and song—Montenegro, Herzegovina, and Slovenia. An empire fifteen millions strong, reaching from Bulgaria to the Adriatic, and from Trieste, east and north, far into the plains of Hungary, which will liberate the energies of the fighting, administrative people of the kingdom of Serbia, penned in their narrow mountain valleys, to the exploitation of the rich plains country, and the powerful life of ships at sea.

Every peasant soldier knows what he is fighting for. When he was a baby, his mother greeted him, "Hail, little avenger of Kossovo!" (At the battle of Kossovo, in the fourteenth century, Serbia fell under the Turks.) When he had done something wrong, his mother reproved him thus: "Not that way will you deliver Macedonia!" The ceremony of passing from infancy to boyhood was marked by the recitation of an ancient poem: "Ja sam Serbin," it began,

"I am a Serbian, born to be a soldier, Son of Iliya, of Milosh, of Vasa, of Marko."

(National heroes, whose exploits here followed at length)

"My brothers are numerous as grapes in the vineyard,

But they are less fortunate than I, a son of free Serbia!

Therefore must I grow quickly, learn to sing and shoot,

That I may hasten to help those who wait for me!"

And in the Serbian schools the children are taught not only the geography of old Serbia, but of all the Serbian lands, in the order of their redemption—first Macedonia, then Dalmatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Croatia, Banat, and Batchka!

Now Kossovo is avenged and Macedonia delivered, within the lifetime of these soldiers who listened to their mothers and never forgot their "brothers, numerous as grapes in the vineyard." But even while we were in Macedonia, other complications threatened.

"What if Italy takes Dalmatia?" I asked a government official.

"It is very exasperating," he replied, "for it means that after we have recovered from this war we must fight again!"

An old officer that we met later said, with a sort of holy enthusiasm: "We thought that this dream of a great Serbia would come true—but many years in the future, many years. And here it is realized in our time! This is something to die for!"

And the boy who sang "Son of Free Serbia" has made his country one of the most democratic in the world. It is governed by the Skouptchina, a one-chamber parliament elected by universal suffrage and proportional representation—the Senate, derisively known as the "Museum," was abolished in 1903. King Alexander tried to rule autocratically, and they murdered him; the present King is strictly a figurehead, limited by a liberal constitution. There is no aristocracy in Serbia. Only the King's brother and the King's sons are princes, and to the Crown Prince Regent the ultra-democrats and Socialists refuse even that title, referring to him always as the "Manifest-Signer." Queen Draga attempted to establish an order of nobility, "but," as Johnson said, laughing, "we keelled her!"

The great landlords of Rumania are unknown in Serbia. Here every peasant has a right to five acres of land, inalienable for debt or taxes; he joins fields with his sons and daughters and nephews and nieces, until all through Serbia there exist co-operative estates known as zadrugas, where generations of one family, with its ramifications, live together in communal ownership of all their property. And as yet there is no industrial population in Serbia, and few rich men.

That night we heard the dramatic story of the great Serbian victory of December. Twice the Austrians invaded the country, and twice were hurled back, and the streets of Valievo groaned with wounded lying in the rain. But the second time the enemy held Shabatatz, Losnitza, and the two rich provinces of Machva and Podrigna, and the heights of Goutchevo. The Serbians could not dislodge them from their strongly entrenched positions. And then, in the bitter weather of December, the Austrians began the third invasion with five hundred thousand men against two hundred and fifty thousand. Pouring across the frontier at three widely separated points, they broke the Serbian lines and rolled the little army back among its mountains. Belgrade was abandoned to the enemy. Twice the Serbians made a desperate stand, and twice they were forced to fall back. Ammunition began to fail—the cannon had less than twenty shells apiece. The enemy passed Krupain and Valievo and was within forty-five miles of Kraguijevatz, headquarters of the Serbian general staff.

And then, at the last minute, something happened. New supplies of ammunition arrived from Salonika, and the younger officers revolted against their more cautious elders, shouting that it was as well to die attacking as to be slaughtered in the trenches. General Michitch ordered an offensive. The beaten Serbians, rushing from their trenches, fell upon the leisurely Austrian columns coming along narrow mountain defiles to attack. Caught on the march, burdened with big guns and heavy baggage-trains on roads almost impassable from mud, the Austrians resisted furiously, but were forced to recoil. The line was broken. Their centre, smashed by Michitch and the first army, broke and fled in panic across the country, abandoning baggage, ammunition, and guns, and leaving behind thousands of dead and wounded, and hospitals crammed with men raving with typhus. This is how the typhus, beginning somewhere up in the plains of Hungary, entered Serbia with the Austrian army. For a time the left wing tried to hold Belgrade, but the exultant, ragged Serbians drove them literally into the River Save and shot them as they swam across.

This great battle, which Voyvoda Michitch reported laconically with the proud telegram, "There remain no Austrian soldiers on Serbian soil except prisoners," has been given no name. Some call it the Battle of Kolubara River and others the Battle of Valievo. But it is, perhaps, the most wonderful feat of arms in all the great World War.

At the right hand of the colonel sat a pope in the long black robes of the Greek Church. He was not unctuous and sly like the Greeks, however—a great ruddy man who laughed uproariously and drank his wine with the officers. These Serbian priests are remarkable people. They are the teachers, the transmitters of patriotism among the peasants. They are elected to the Skouptchina as deputies of districts.

"Why not?" he said in French. "In Serbia there is no Clerical party. We are all one here—eh?" He turned to the colonel, who nodded. "I have now been fighting in the army for three years—not as a priest, but as a Serbian soldier. Yes, we are the State Church, but the government also subsidizes the Protestant and Catholic Churches, and even the Mohammedan hadjis. Why, it is really extraordinary. The government pays the Mohammedan mufii thirty thousand denars a year, and the metropolitan of the Serbian Church only gets twenty thousand! Our people do not forget that Milan Obrenovitch proclaimed the revolution against the Turks at a village church, with a pope at his side. We are Serbs and men first, and priests afterward." He laughed. "Have you heard the story of how the Serbian bishop, Duchitch, shocked the Bishop of London? No? Well, they dined together in England.

"'You are fortunate,' said the Bishop of London, 'in your people. I am told they are very devout.'

"'Yes,' said Mr. Duchitch, 'in Serbia we do not trust too much to God. We prayed God five centuries to free us from the Turks, and finally took guns and did it ourselves!'"

It was midnight when we took the train for Belgrade, less than a hundred kilometres away, but by morning we were still far from the city. We crawled slowly along, waiting hours on sidings for the passing of trains going north laden with soldiers and with supplies, and empty trains going south; for we were now within the lines of the Army of the Danube, and on the main military artery serving fifty thousand men. It was a region of high, rolling hills, and here and there a loftier mountain crowned with the ruined castle of some Dahee overlord, dating from Turkish days. There was no longer any pretense of cultivation. Hillside after hillside hollowed into caves or covered with huts of mud and straw housed the ragged regiments; trenches gashed in the sloping meadows crisscrossed that hard-fought ground—and in spots where the battle had been particularly fierce, the jagged stumps of great oak-trees stood branchless and leafless, stripped bare by the hail of shells and riflebullets.

The railway-station of Belgrade had been destroyed in the bombardment, and one by one the searching Austrian cannon had wrecked the nearer stations, so we were forced to leave the train at Rakovitza, six miles out, and drive to the city. The road wound through a beautiful, fertile valley, with white villas and farmhouses smothered in thick blooming chestnuts. Nearer town we entered the shaded road of an immense park, where in summer the fashionable world of Belgrade comes to show its smartest carriages and its newest gowns. Now the roads were weedy, the lawns dusty and unkempt. A shell had wrecked the summer pavilion. Under the big trees at the edge of an ornamental fountain a troop of cavalry was picketed, and a little farther on the tennis-court had been disembowelled to make emplacements for two French cannon—the French sailors of the gun crew, lying around on the grass, shouted gayly to us.

Our carriage had taken a left-hand road, leading toward the River Save, when suddenly a distant deep booming fell upon our ears. It was like nothing else in the world, the double boom of big cannon, and the shrill flight of shells. And now, nearer at hand, off to the left, other great guns answered. A two-horsed cab, its horses galloping, appeared around a turn ahead, and a fat officer leaned out as he passed us.

"Don't go that way!" he shouted. "Putzaiyu! They are firing on the road! The English batteries are replying!"

We turned around and took a long detour that led around to the right. For about a quarter of an hour the far shooting continued—then it ceased. A deep, steady humming had been growing more and more audible for some time, filling all the air. Suddenly there came the heavy, sharp crack of a detonation over our heads. We looked up. There, immeasurably high, gleaming like a pale dragon-fly in the sun, an aeroplane hovered. Her lower planes were painted in concentric circles of red and blue. "French!" said Johnson. She was already turning slowly toward the east and south. Behind her, not more than a hundred yards it seemed, the white puff of an exploding shrapnel slowly flowered. Even as we looked, another distant gun spoke, and another, and the shells leaped after her as she drifted out of our vision behind the trees.

We crawled up a steep hill and descended the other side along a straight, white, unpaved road. In front of us, perched on a high headland between the Danube and the Save, was Belgrade, the Beograd of the Serbians, the White City which was ancient when they first came down from the Hungarian mountains, and yet is one of the youngest of the world's cities. Down at the bottom of the hill a long double file of Austrian prisoners, dusty with the long march from Rackovitz, stood patiently in the sun while two Serbian officers questioned them.

"Of what race are you?"

"I am a Serb from Bosnia, gospodine" answered the prisoner, grinning.

"And you?"

"Krati" (Croat) "of the mountains."

"Well, brothers," said the officer, "this is a nice thing for you to be fighting for the Swabos!"

"Ah!" answered the Croat. "We asked permission to fight with you, but they wouldn't let us." Every one laughed.

"And what race are you?"

"Italiano from Trieste."

"Tchek."

"I am Magyar!" growled a sullen-faced, squat man with a look of hate.

"And you?"

"I am Rumaniaschi" (Rumanian), said the last man proudly.

A few hundred yards farther along was a great shed stored with all sorts of provisions, fodder, hay, and grain for the army. Here in the hot sun the Austrian prisoners were sweating at their work of loading ox-carts with sacks of flour, their uniforms, hands, and faces caked with white meal. A sentry with a bayoneted rifle walked up and down in front of them, and as he walked he chanted:

"God bless my grandfather, Vladislav Wenz, who came to settle in Serbia forty years ago. If he hadn't, I would now be packing flour with these prisoners!" BELGRADE UNDER THE AUSTRIAN GUNS OUR carriage rattled, echoing through silent Belgrade. Grass and weeds pushed between the cobbles, untravelling now for half a year. The sound of guns had entirely ceased. A hot sun blazed down, dazzling on the white walls of the houses, and a little warm wind whirled spirals of white dust from the unpaved roadway; it was hard to imagine that the Austrian big guns dominated us, and that any moment they might bombard the city, as they had a dozen times before. Everywhere were visible the effects of artillery fire. Great holes fifteen feet in diameter gaped in the middle of the street. A shell had smashed the roof of the Military College and exploded within, shattering all the windows; the west wall of the War Office had sloughed down under a concentrated fire of heavy guns; the Italian legation was pitted and scarred by shrapnel, and the flag hung ragged from its broken pole. Doorless private houses, with roofs cascading to the sidewalks, showed window-frames swinging idly askew without a pane of glass. Along that crooked boulevard which is Belgrade's main and the only paved street, the damage was worse. Shells had dropped through the roof of the Royal Palace and gutted the interior. As we passed, a dragged peacock, which had once adorned the Royal Gardens, stood screaming in a ruined window, while a laughing group of soldiers clustered on the sidewalk underneath imitating it. Hardly anything had escaped that hail of fire—houses, sheds, stables, hotels, restaurants, shops, and public buildings—and there were many fresh ruins from the latest bombardment, only ten days before. A five-story office-building with the two top floors blown off by a 30.5-centimetre shell exhibited a half section of a room—an iron bed hanging perilously in the air, and flowered wall-paper decorated with framed pictures, untouched by the freak of the explosion. The University of Belgrade was only a mass of yawning ruins. The Austrians had made it their special target, for there had been the hotbed of Pan-Serbian propaganda, and among the students was formed the secret society whose members murdered the Archduke Franz Ferdinand.

We met an officer who belonged to this society—a classmate of the assassin. "Yes," he said, "the government knew. It tried to discourage us, but it could do nothing. Of course the government did not countenance our propaganda." He grinned and winked. "But how could it prevent? Our constitution guarantees the freedom of assemblies and organizations.... We are a free country!"

Johnson was unmoved by the wreck.

"For years we have been cramped and inconvenienced in that old building," he explained. "But the University was too poor to build again. Now we shall demand in the terms of peace one of the German universities—libraries, laboratories, and all complete. They have many, and we have only one. We have not yet decided whether to ask for Heidelberg or Bonn...."

Already people were beginning to drift back to the city which they had deserted six months before, at the time of the first bombardment. Every evening, toward sundown, the streets became more and more crowded. A few stores timidly opened, some restaurants, and the cafes where the true Belgradian spends all his time sipping beer and watching the fashionable world pass. Johnson kept up a flow of comment on the people who sat at tables, or went by along the street.

"You see that little, important-looking man with the glasses? He is Mr. R, who is very ambitious and thinks himself a great man. He is editor of an insignificant newspaper called La Depeche, which he published here every day under the bombardment, and imagined himself a great hero. But there is a little song about him which is sung all over Belgrade:

"An Austrian cannon-ball flew through the air.

It said: "Now I shall destroy Belgrade, the White City";

But when it saw that it would hit R

It held its nose, crying "Phoot I"—and went the other way I!"

In the corner a stout, dirty man with the look of a Jewish politician was holding forth to a crowd.

"That is S, editor of the Mali Journal.

There are three brothers, one of them a trick bicyclerider. This man and the other brother founded a little paper here which lived by blackmailing prominent people. They were desperately poor. No one would pay the blackmail. So they published every day for two weeks a photograph of the bicycle-rider with his bare legs, bare arms, and medals on his chest, so that some heiress with millions of denars would become enamoured of his beautiful physique and marry him!"

We visited the ancient Turkish citadel which crowns the abrupt headland towering over the junction of the Save and the Danube. Here, where the Serbian guns had been placed, the Austrian fire had fallen heaviest; hardly a building but had been literally wrecked. Roads and open spaces were pitted with craters torn by big shells. All the trees were stripped. Between two shattered walls we crawled on our bellies to the edge of the cliff overlooking the river.

"Don't show yourselves," cautioned the captain who had us in charge. "Every time the Swabos see anything moving here, they drop us a shell."

From the edge there was a magnificent view of the muddy Danube in flood, inundated islands sticking tufts of tree tops above the water, and the wide plains of Hungary drowned in a yellow sea to the horizon. Two miles away, across the Save, the Austrian town of Semlin slept in radiant sunlight. On that low height to the west and south were planted the invisible threatening cannon. And beyond, following southwest the winding Save as far as the eye could see, the blue mountains of Bosnia piled up against the pale sky. Almost immediately below us lay the broken steel spans of the international railway bridge which used to link Constantinople to western Europe—plunging prodigiously from their massive piers into the turbid yellow water. And upstream still was the half-sunken island of Tzigalnia, where the Serbian advance-guards lay in their trenches and sniped the enemy on another island four hundred yards away across the water. The captain pointed to several black dots lying miles away up the Danube behind the shoulder of Semlin.

"Those are the Austrian monitors," he said. "And that low black launch that lies close in to shore down there to the east, she is the English gunboat. Last night she stole up the river and torpedoed an Austrian monitor. We expect the city to be bombarded any minute now. The Austrians usually take it out on Belgrade."

But the day passed and there was no sign from the enemy, except once when a French aeroplane soared up over the Save. Then white shrapnel cracked over our heads, and long after the biplane had slanted down eastward again, the guns continued to fire, miles astern.

"They have learned their lesson," said Johnson complacently. "The last time they bombarded Belgrade, they were answered by the big English, French, and Russian naval guns, which they did not know were here. We bombarded Semlin and silenced two Austrian positions."

We made the tour of the foreign batteries with the captain next day. The French guns and their marines were posted among trees on the top of a high, wooded hill overlooking the Save. They were served by French marines. Farther along Russian sailors lolled on the grass about their heavy cannon, and on the sloping meadows back of Belgrade lay the British, guarding the channel of the Danube against the Austrian supply-boats which were moored above Semlin, waiting for a chance to slip past down the Danube, with guns and ammunition for the Turks. The Serbian batteries were a queer mixture of ordnance; there were old field-guns made by Creusot in France for the First Balkan War, ancient bronze pieces cast for King Milan in the Turkish War, and all kinds and calibers captured from the Austrians—German fieldguns, artillery manufactured in Vienna for the Sultan, ornamented with Turkish symbols, and new cannon ordered by Yuan Shi Kai, their breeches covered with Chinese characters.

Our window looked out over the roofs of the city to the broad current of the Save, and the sinister highland beyond where the enemy's guns were. At night the great Austrian search-light would flare suddenly upon the stream and the city, blinding; sparks would leap and die among the trees of the river islands, and we would hear the pricking rifle-fire where the outposts lay in mud with their feet in the water, and killed each other in the dark. One night the English batteries roared behind the town, and their shells whistled over our heads as they drove back the Austrian monitors who were trying to creep down the river. Then the invisible guns of the highland across the Save spat red; for an hour heavy missiles hurtled through the sky, exploding miles back about the smoking English guns—the ground shook where we stood.

"So you want to visit the trenches," said the captain. We had driven out a mile or so through the outskirts of the city that lay along the Save, always in sight of the Austrian guns. Our carriages were spaced two hundred yards apart, for two vehicles together would have drawn fire. Where we stood the shore jutted out into the flooded river behind the trees of a submerged island that screened us from the Austrian bank. "It is not very safe. We must go in a boat and pass three hundred yards of open water commanded by an Austrian cannon."

The aged launch was supposed to be armored; a heavy sheet of tin roofed her engine-pit, and thin steel plates leaned against the bulwarks. As soon as we rounded the protecting curtain of trees, the soldier who was pilot, engineer, and crew stood up and shook his fist at the point of land where the Austrian gun lay.

IX THE SKRII TRENCHES OX THE SAVE. TWO HUNDRED YARDS FROM THE AUSTRIAN'S.

"Oh, cowards and sons of cowards!" he chanted. "Why do you not fire, Swabo cowards? Does the sight of unarmed Serbians cause your knees to knock together?"

This he kept up until the launch slipped out of range behind Tzigalnia, alongside a huge cargo-scow, painted black and loopholed for rifles. On her bow, in large yellow letters, was Ne-boysha, which is Serbian for "Dread-nought."

"That is the Serbian navy," laughed the captain. "With her we have fought a great battle. In January, one dark night, we filled her full of soldiers and let her float down the river. That is how we captured this island."

From the Neboysa a precarious plank footbridge on floating logs led between half-submerged willow-trees to a narrow strip of land not more than ten feet wide and two hundred yards long. Here the soldiers had dug their rude rifle-pits, and here they lay forward on the muddy embankment, unshaven, unwashed, clothed in rags, and gaunt with scanty, bad food. From head to foot they were the color of mud, like animals. Many of the trenches were below the flood level, and held water; you could see where, only two days before, the river had risen until it was up to the men's waists. We could not walk along the line of trenches—soldiers poled us up and down in little scows.

A score of shaggy, big men in fur caps, with riflebelts crossed over their chests and hand bombs slung at their shoulders, were at work under an armed guard, surlily digging trenches. These were comitadjis, the captain said—irregular volunteers without uniform, drawn from the half-bandits, half-revolutionists, who had been making desperate guerilla war against Turks, Bulgarians, and Greeks in Macedonia for years.

"They are under arrest," he explained. "They refused to dig trenches or work on the roads. 'We have come to fight the Swabos/ they said, 'not to dig ditches. We are warriors, not laborers!'"

Removing our hats, we peered cautiously through the gaps made for the rifles; a similar barren neck of land appeared about four hundred yards away through the tree tops rising from the water—for all this had once been land—where the Austrians lay. A blue peaked cap bobbed cautiously up—the soldier beside me grunted and fired. Almost immediately there was a scattering burst of shots from the enemy. Bullets whined close over our heads, and from the trees green leaves showered down.

Our boatman thrust off from the Neboysa and headed the launch upstream before he rounded into the channel swept by the Austrian artillery, a quarter of a mile away.

"We will go closer," said he; "perhaps it will tempt them."

The clumsy, chugging boat swept clear. He stood up in the stern, cupped his hands, and belloyed a satirical verse that the soldiers sang:

"The Emperor Nicholas rides a black horse,
The Emperor Franz Joseph rides a mule—

And he put the bridle on the tail instead of the head,

So now is the end of Austria!"

Hardly had he finished—the boat was within fifty yards of the sheltering island—when a sudden detonation stunned us. We hit the bottom of the boat with one simultaneous thud just as something screamed three yards over our heads, and the roof of a building on the shore heaved up with a roar, filling the air with whistling fragments of tiles and lead pellets—shrapnel.

"Whoop!" shouted the steersman. "There's enough black balls to defeat any candidate!"

Now we were behind the sheltering trees. A rowboat full of soldiers put off from the bank, paddling frantically.

"Don't go out there!" cried the captain to them. "They are firing!"

"That's why we're going!" they cried altogether, like children. "Perhaps they'll take a shot at us!" They rounded the island with shouts and a prodigious splashing of oars....

Lunch was ready in the ruins of a great sugar factory, where the colonel in command of the island had his headquarters. To get to it, we crossed a bridge of planks laid on a quaking marsh of brown sugar—tons and tons of it, melted when the Austrian shells had set fire to the place.

The colonel, two captains, four lieutenants, a corporal, and two privates sat down with us. In Serbia I the silly tradition that familiarity between officers and men destroys discipline apparently does not exist. Many times in restaurants we noticed a private or a non-commissioned officer approach a table where officers sat, salute stiffly, and then shake hands all around and sit down. And here the sergeant who waited on table took his place between us to drink his coffee and was formally introduced.

One of the privates had been secretary of the Serbian National Theatre before the war. He told us that the charter required fifty performances of Shakespeare a season, and that the Serbians preferred Coriolanus to all the other plays.

"Hamlet," he said, "was very popular. But we have not played it here for fifteen years, for the only actor who could do the part died in 1900." ALONG THE BATTLE-LINE

A THOUSAND feet up two French aeroplanes hummed slowly west, translucent in the clear morning sunlight. Below and to the left lazy shrapnel burst. The sound of the explosions and the humming of the motors drifted down, minutes later. Our carriages crawled up a hill strewn with villas hidden in new verdure and flowering fruit-trees; and, looking back, we had a last view of Belgrade, the White City, on her headland, and the Austrian shore. Then we plunged into a winding, rutted lane that wandered up beneath trees which met overhead—past low, white peasant houses roofed with heavy Turkish tiles, and fields where women in embroidered leather vests and linen skirts tramped the furrows, leading oxen lent by the army, and followed by soldiers who guided the wooden ploughs. Long strips of homespun linen hung from hedge and fence, bleaching in the sun. Except for the soldiers, the country was destitute of men.

We turned inland, along country roads that were little more than tracks—now one could not use the main road along the Save, for it lay directly under the guns of the Austrian trenches, three hundred yards away across the river. Many times the driver lost the way. We forded rapid mountain streams that washed to the wagon-bed, sank to the hubs in muddy sloughs, crept through winding, deep ravines along the dried beds of torrents, and rattled down steep hills through groves of immense oaks, where droves of half-wild pigs fled squealing before the horses. Once we passed three huge tombstones taller than a man, crowned with the carved turbans that ornament the cenotaphs of the hadjis. Immense scimitars were chiselled at their base. Johnson asked some peasants about them, but they answered "Heroes," and shrugged their shoulders. Farther on was a white stone sarcophagus lying in a hollow of the hill—the Roman tomb that once enclosed it had been broken up and carried away by the peasants, perhaps centuries ago. Then the track led through the middle of an ancient village graveyard, its moss-grown Greek crosses leaning crazily among dense brush. Everywhere along the way new crosses of stone, painted with gold, green, and red, stood under little roofs; these, Johnson explained, were the memorials of men of the neighborhood who had died in unknown places and whose bodies had never been found. Trees and grass and flowers rioted over the hills. Last year's fields were jungles of weeds. Houses with doors ajar and gaping windows lay amid untended vines. Sometimes we bumped down the wide street of a silent country village where old men dragged themselves to their doors to see us pass, and children romped with wolfish sheep-dogs in the dust, and groups of women came home from the fields with mattocks on their shoulders. This was the rackia country—where the native plum brandy comes from; immense orchards of prunes and plums sweetened the heavy air.

We stopped at a mehana or village inn to eat the lunch we had brought with us—for in all this country there was not enough food even for the inhabitants. In the dim, cool interior, with its rough wooden tables set on the earthen floor, aged peasants with the simplicity of children took off their hats with grave politeness. "Dobar dan, gospodinel" they greeted us. "Good day, sirs! We hope your voyage is pleasant." The gnarled old proprietor stooped over his earthen oven, making Turkish coffee in brass cups and telling how the Austrians had come.

"A soldier with a rifle and a bayonet came through this door. 'I want money,' he said; 'all you have—quick!' But I answered that I had no money. 'You must have money. Are you not an innkeeper?' Still I said I had none; then he thrust at me with his bayonet—here. You see?" He tremblingly lifted his shirt and showed a long gash, yet unhealed.

"Typhus!" Johnson pointed to the fences before the houses on each side of the road. Almost every one was marked with a painted white cross, sometimes two or three. "Every cross means a case of typhus in the house." In half a mile I counted more than a hundred. It seemed as if this buoyant, fertile land held nothing but death or the memorials of death.

Late in the afternoon we topped a hill and saw again the wide-spread Save flooding all its valley, and beyond, foothills piling greenly up to the Bosnian mountains, range behind range. Here the river made a great bend, and half concealed in the middle of a wooded plain that seemed entirely under water lay red roofs, white swollen towers and thin minarets—Obrenovatz. We drove down the hill and joined the main road, which rose just above the flood level, like a causeway through wastes of water. In the marshes on either side sacred white storks were solemnly fishing. The ground rose a little in a sort of island at the centre of the flooded country; we rattled along the rocky, unpaved street of a white little Serbian town, low houses set in clumps of green, with double windows to keep out the vampires.

They led us with much ceremony to the house of Gaia Matitch, the postmaster, a nervous, slight man with a sweet smile, who welcomed us at his door. His wife stood beside him, fluttered, anxious, and bursting with the importance of entertaining strangers. The entire family waved us before them into their bedroom, which they had ornamented with the whitest linen, the gayest embroideries, and vases full of flowers from the marsh. Two officers from the divisional headquarters stood around racking their brains for things to make us comfortable; a little girl brought plates of apples and preserved plums and candied oranges; soldiers fell on their knees and pulled at our boots, and another stood by the wash-stand waiting to pour water over our hands; Gaia Matitch himself wandered in and out of the room, a bottle of rackia in his hand, offering us a drink, tidying the chairs and tables, shouting shrill, exasperated orders to the servants.

"We are greatly honored," he managed to convey, in a mixture of garbled French, German, and English. "In Serbia it is the highest honor for a stranger to visit one's house."

This beautiful Serbian hospitality to foreigners we experienced many times. Once, I remember we were in a strange town where for weeks no new supplies had come in, and there was no tobacco. We went to a shop to try to find some cigarettes.

"Cigarettes?" said the shopkeeper, throwing up his hands. "Cigarettes are worth double their weight in gold." He looked at us for a moment. "Are you strangers?" We said we were. Whereupon, he unlocked an iron safe and handed us each a package of cigarettes. "The charge is nothing," he said: "You are foreigners."

Our friend Matitch, with the tears standing in his eyes, pointed to two photographs on the wall—one of an old man with a white beard, and the other of a young girl.

"This man is my father," he said. "He was seventy-seven years old. When the Austrians took Shabatz they sent him to Buda-Pesth as a prisoner of war, and he is dead there in Hungary. As for my sister here, they took her also—and since August I have heard nothing. I know not whether she is living or dead."

Here we first began to hear of Austrian atrocities along the western frontier. We could not believe them at first; but later, at Belgrade, at Shabatz, at Los-nitza, they were repeated again and again, by those who escaped, by the families of those who were dead or in prison, by sworn statements and the Austrian official lists of prisoners sent to the Serbian Red Cross. At the taking of the border towns the Austrians herded the civil population together—women, old men, and children—and drove them into Austria-Hungary as prisoners of war. More than seven hundred were so taken from Belgrade, and fifteen hundred from Shabatz alone. The official war-prisoner lists of the Austrian Government read cynically like this: Ion Touphechitch, age 84; Darinka Antitch (woman), age 23; Georg Georgevitch, age 78; Voyslav Petronievitch, age 12; Maria Wenz, age 69. The Austrian officers said they did this because it was a punitive expedition against the Serbs, and not a war!

At the mess we heard that we must travel by night to Shabatz, for the road led along the river bank within range of the enemy's trenches. So after dinner the entire staff accompanied us back to Matitch's. Much sour native wine had been flowing, and we went arm in arm hooting and singing along the village street. When Matitch heard that we were not going to spend the night in his house, he almost wept.

"Please stay!" he cried, grasping our arms. "Isn't my house good enough for you? Is there anything you lack?"

At length, with a sigh he thrust us into the diningroom. There we sat, saying farewell, while Matitch and Mrs. Matitch brought wine and dried salt beef to make us thirsty. A courteous officer inquired from Johnson how one drank a health in French; but all he could get was "A voire sentir /" which he repeated over and over again. We drank Mrs. Matitch's health, at which the good woman was furiously embarrassed. We sang American songs to uproarious applause. Some one stuffed Robinson's pockets full of dried beef, which fell out of his clothes for days afterward. It got along toward midnight, and we ought to have started at ten. Of a sudden Matitch rose to his feet. "Pobratim!" he shouted, and all the others echoed "Pobraiim!"

"I now make you my pobratim—my bloodbrother," said he, glowing with friendliness. "It is the old Serbian ceremony. Your arm through mine—so!"

One by one we linked elbows and drank thus, and then threw our arms about each other's necks, and embraced loudly on both cheeks. The company roared and pounded on the table. It was done—and to this day we are pobratim with Gaia Matitch.

At length we were in the carriages; the drivers snapped their whips, and we were off, to shouts of "S Bogom! Farewell! LakuNoch! Happy night!"

There was a bright moon. As we passed the outskirts of the village, two silent, armed figures on horseback fell in behind the first carriage, riding along with us till the danger zone was passed. Now we pitched and tossed over rocks or wallowed through deep mud; again the horses were splashing in water that rose to the hubs, where the river-flood covered the road. The drivers cracked their whips no more, nor shouted—they cursed the horses in low tones, for we were now within hearing of the Austrian trenches. No sound was heard except the beat of the horses' hoofs and the creaking of the carriage.

The moon sank slowly. The mounted guards vanished as mysteriously as they had come. Still we rocked on. Gently the wide, starry sky paled to dawn, and eastward, over the great mountains of Tser, where the Serbians broke the first invasion, came the white and silver dawn. Under a grassy hill crowned with an enormous white Greek church wrecked by artillery fire, a hundred ox-carts were scattered in the fields, their drivers sleeping wrapped in blankets of vivid colors, or squatting around early fires that painted their faces red. They were bound for Belgrade, a week's crawling journey away, to bring back food for the starving country where we were going.

Over the mountains leaped the sun, hot and blinding, and we rattled into the streets of Shabatz, between endless rows of smashed and gutted and empty houses, before the town was awake.

A cafe stood open. We made for it, and ordered coffee. Was there anything to eat? We were ravenous. The woman shook her head. "In Shabatz there is not even bread."

"Eggs!" we cried.

Johnson lazily threw up his hands. "My dear sairs! Excuse me. There is no eggs. Thees is war!"

"But I saw hens up the street," I insisted. Finally Johnson consented to ask the woman.

"There are no eggs for sale here," she replied. "But since the gospodine are strangers, we will give you some."

Shabatz had been a rich and important town, metropolis of the wealthiest department in Serbia, Machva, and the centre of a great fruit, wine, wool, and silk trade. It contained twenty-five hundred houses. Some had been destroyed by the guns; twice as many more were wantonly burned, and all of them had been broken into and looted. One walked along miles and miles of streets—every house was gutted. The invaders had taken linen, pictures, children's playthings, furniture—and what was too heavy or cumbersome to move they had wrecked with axes. They had stabled their horses in the bedrooms of fine houses. In private libraries all the books lay scattered in filth on the floor, carefully ripped from their covers. Not simply a few houses had been so treated—every house. It was a terrible thing to see.

At the time of the first invasion many people remained in Shabatz, trusting that they would be safe. But the soldiers were loosed like wild beasts in the city, burning, pillaging, raping. We saw the gutted Hotel d'Europe, and the blackened and mutilated church where three thousand men, women, and children were penned up together without food or water for four days, and then divided into two groups—one sent back to Austria as prisoners of war, the other driven ahead of the army as it marched south against the Serbians. This is not unsupported rumor or hysterical accusation, as it is often in France and Belgium; it is a fact proved by a mass of sworn testimony, by hundreds of people who made that terrible march. We talked with several; one a very old woman who had been forced at the point of the bayonet to go on foot before the troops more than thirty-five miles to Valievo. Her shoes had rotted from her feet—for ten miles she walked barefoot over the stony road.

In the Prefecture we went over hundreds of reports, affidavits, and photographs, giving names, ages, addresses of the sufferers, and details of the horrible things the Austrians had done. There was one picture taken at the village of Lechnitz, showing more than a hundred women and children chained together, their heads struck off and lying in a separate heap. At Kravitz old men, women, and children were tortured and fiendishly outraged, then butchered. At Yvremovatz fifty people were herded into a cellar and burned alive. Five undefended to us were razed to the ground—forty-two villages were sacked, and the greater part of their inhabitants massacred. The typhus, brought into the country by the Austrian army, still ran riot through Shabatz and all the region. And here there were no doctors nor hospitals.

To be perfectly fair, let me say that everywhere we were told it was the Hungarians, and not the Austrian Germans, who had committed these atrocities—the Hungarians, who have always been enemies of the Serbs, in Croatia as well as here. The Austrians themselves seem to have behaved fairly well; they paid for what they took and did not bother peaceable civilians.

But the Hungarians reverted to their savage ancestors, the Huns. When they retreated from Shabatz, in December, they gathered together in the courtyard of Gachitch's pharmacy three hundred Serbian soldiers taken prisoners in battle, shot them slowly and then broke their necks. Belgium can show no horrors as black as these.... The coldblooded fiends who committed them gave as an excuse that the townspeople had harbored comitadjis—who, they had been told by their officers, were savage bandits, to be shot on sight. But in all this region there were no comitadjis, nor ever had been. In the country they pretended to believe that the Serbian peasant costume was the comitadji uniform—and since every civilian, man, woman, and child, wore it, they butchered them all. The slaughter of the prisoners of war had no excuse.

In this once flourishing and pleasant city hardly two hundred people now lived, camping miserably in their ruined houses, without enough to eat. We wandered in the hot sun through deserted streets, past the square where once the great market of all northwest Serbia had been held, and the peasants had gathered in their bright dress from hundreds of kilometres of rich mountain valleys and fertile plains. It was market-day. A few miserable women in rags stood mournfully by their baskets of sickly vegetables. And on the steps of the gutted Prefecture sat a young man whose eyes had been stabbed out by Hungarian bayonets. He was tall and broadshouldered, with ruddy cheeks—dressed in the dazzling homespun linen of the peasant's summer costume, and in his hat he wore yellow dandelions. He played a melancholy tune upon a horse-headed Serbian fiddle and sang:

"I am sad, for I have lost the sight of the sun and the green fields and the blossoming plum-trees. God's blessing to you who have given me a grosh (four cents). Blessing to all who are about to give"

The prefect pointed to the broken buildings. "When the war is finished we shall make a new Shabatz," he said. "The government has already ordered that no one shall repair the old ruined houses. They must be rebuilt entirely new."

A NATION EXTERMINATED NEXT morning we boarded the train of the narrow-gauge railroad which taps the richest part of the Machva, and connects the valley of the Drina with the valley of the Save. Four box-cars followed our carriage, crammed with miserable refugees, chiefly women and children—returning to the homes from which they had fled, destitute and on foot, six months ago, before the Austrian scourge. We went slowly along a vast fertile plain, white with fruit orchards in bloom and green with tall grass and new foliage, between uncultivated fields rank with weeds, and past white houses blackened with fire. All this country had been burned, looted, and its people murdered. Not an ox was seen, and for miles not a man. We passed through little towns where grass grew in the streets and not a single human being lived. Sometimes the train would halt to let the refugees descend; they stood there beside the track, all their possessions in sacks over their shoulders, gazing silently at the ruins of their homes....

The prefect came with us, stopping the train for an hour or so at different villages, to show us the sights. So we visited Prnjavor, once a rich little place of three thousand people, now a waste of burned and smashed dwellings. At the station was a tall, rugged old farmer in peasant costume of rough brown wool, who was introduced to us as Mr. Samourovitch, deputy to the Skouptchina. He pointed down into a pool of muddy water beside the railroad track, from which emerged the top of a heap of earth, crowned with two wooden crosses.

"That is the grave of my old father and mother," he said without emotion, "the Swabos shot them for comitadjis." We walked on into the town, to a place where once a house stood, that now was a black heap of ashes and burnt timbers. "In this place," he went on, "the Hungarians gathered together a hundred citizens of Prnjavor—they could not cram them all into the house, so they made the rest stand close and bound them to it with ropes—and then they set fire to the house, and shot those who tried to escape.... This long, low pile of dirt is their grave." The story seemed too horrible for any possibility, and I made particular inquiries about it. But it was literally true. Swiss doctors examined the spot and took photographs of the bodies before they were buried; they were all old people, women, and children.

Stagnant pools from the recent rains, covered with green slime, stood in the streets. A smell of decaying bodies and neglected filth was in the air. Before almost every house at least one sinister white cross was painted on the fence to show where typhus was or had been. In the dooryard of one place, where the grass had been dug up to make one huge grave for many people, a wrinkled, limping woman stood surrounded by nine children, all under fifteen. Two were almost unable to stand, dead-white and shaking from some fever; three others, one only a baby, were covered with huge running sores and scabs. The woman pointed to the grave-mound.

"I have lost every one but these—there are my husband and my sister and my father, and my brother-in-law and his wife. And we have nothing fit to feed these sick children. The condensed milk that the government sends for the children—the president of the town gives it only to his political constituents, the dishonest Socialist!"

This woman and her children, living in miserable squalor, were all that remained of a powerful zadrouga. Two long, one-story white houses, fronting on the street where it turned at right angles, embraced a sort of patio, carpeted with long grass and wild flowers, and shaded by an ancient oak. The entrance to the houses was from the garden, and there was another house behind, with offices, stables, and the rackia distillery, where the family made its own plum brandy. Here lived three generations, the women with their husbands, the men with their wives, and each couple with its children—not to mention cousins, aunts, uncles—more than forty people in all, who shared their land and all their property in common. The buildings were wrecked and burned; of the people, some had died in battle, others had been murdered by the Hungarians, and the typhus had done the rest.

"They did terrible things," said old Samourovitch as we walked back to the train. "We are happy that we paid the Austrians for all this by beating them so badly in December." This extraordinary lack of bitterness we found everywhere in Serbia; the people seemed to think that the smashing Austrian defeat revenged them for all those black enormities, for the murder of their brothers, for the bringing of the typhus.

Through meadows gorgeous with purple larkspur and buttercups, through orchards heavy with peach, apple, cherry, and plum blossoms we went; here the Turkish influence entirely died out, and the mud houses became entirely Serb—capped no longer with red tiles, but with peaked roofs of rough wooden shingles. Then appeared once more over the westward plain the green Bosnian mountains, and we were at Losnitza—again under the Austrian guns across the Drina.

There was a typhus hospital, which we visited. It had once been a school. As the Serbian doctor opened the doors of room after room, a sickening stench of dirt, filthy clothing and airlessness came out. The windows were all closed. The sick—mostly soldiers in the wreck of their uncleaned uniforms—lay packed closely shoulder to shoulder upon foul straw spread on the floor. There was no sign of disinfectant. Some leaned weakly on their elbows, scratching feebly for vermin; others tossed and chattered in delirium, and others lay whitely still, their eyes half open, like the dead.

"It gets better every day," said the doctor, rubbing his hands. "Two weeks ago we had four hundred here—now there are only eighty-six...." He glanced meditatively at the sick men, jammed so close together that they almost lay upon one another. "Then we were crowded."

At dusk we sat at a cafe table in the great square of Losnitza, drinking Turkish coffee and eating black bread and kaymak—delicious yellow cheese-butter. In the dim evening light oxen knelt by their carts, and peasants all in white linen stood in bright groups, talking. From ten different doors of drinking-shops about the immense space, floods of yellow light poured, and there came bursts of violin music and singing. We got up and strolled over to one; the proprietress, a scrawny woman with yellow hair, caught sight of us, and raised a shrill yell: "Why do you stand there in the street? Why do you not come here and sit at my tables? I have all sorts of good wine, beer, and koni-ak!" We meekly obeyed.

"We are Americans," I explained as best I could, "and we do not know your language."

"That's no reason why you can't drink!" she cried brazenly, and slapped me on the back. "I don't care what language you drink in!"

Inside two gypsies were playing, one a fiddle and the other a cornet, while an old peasant, his head thrown back, intoned through his nose the ballad of the Bombardment of Belgrade:

The Bombardment Of Belgrade

"A dream had Madame Georgina,
The faithful spouse of Nicola Pachitch
The well-known Serbian prime minister;

In her palace in the centre of Belgrade
She had a dream, and this was her dream:

"Northward the earth trembles—
Trembled Srem, Batchka and Hungary—

And a terrible darkness
Rolls south upon Belgrade,
The White City that rides the waters.

Athwart the gloom lightnings cross,
And thunder follows after,

Smiting the houses and the palaces,

Wrecking the villas and hotels

And the fine shops of Belgrade.

From the Save and the Danube

Soar the roaring water-dragons—

Spitting thunder and lightnings

Over Belgrade, the White City;

Blasting houses and streets,

Reducing to ruin hotels and palaces,

Smashing the wooden pavements,

Burning the pretty shops,

And upsetting churches and chapels;

Everywhere the screams of children and invalids—

Everywhere the cries of old women and old men!

As if the last terrible Day of Judgment Broke over Belgrade!

"Then in the night Madame Georgina awoke,

Asking herself what had happened,

And began to weep,

For she knew not how to interpret her dream.

Then awoke Nicola Pachitch also

And addressed his faithful spouse:

'What is the matter with thee, faithful spouse,

That thou risest in the night

And wettest thy cheek with tears?

Of what art thou frightened?

Tell it me, my faithful spouse, Whom God bless!"

"Then spoke Madame Pachitch:

My master! Pachitch, Nicola! This night have I had a terrible dream. I have dreamed, and in my dream have seen many things, But I cannot interpret them, Therefore am I miserable and worried.' And she began to tell her dream...." (Three hundred lines more, consisting mostly of accurate prophecy by Mr. Pachitch on what actually occurred.)

Over the sharp, crumpled house roofs westward the swollen cupola of a Greek church rose black against the warm yellow sky. And there were great trees, spread like lace across the firmament, where already faint stars glittered. A thin crescent moon floated up over the shadowy Bosnian mountains, the heart and birthplace of Serbian song—dear land so long an exile....

GOUTCHEVO AND THE VALLEY OF CORPSES BEFORE dawn next morning we were on horseback, galloping out of Losnitza on the way to Goutchevo Mountain, which towered in a lofty series of wooded crests three thousand feet up to the south. It was the summit of Goutchevo that the Austrians seized and intrenched at the time of the second invasion. In the face of their withering fire the Serbians climbed its eastern side, foot by foot, until their trenches were also upon the narrow crest, and along a front of ten miles on top of a savage mountain was fought that strange Battle Above the Clouds which lasted fifty-four days, and ended with the retirement of the Serbs, only because the third invasion had broken their lines down by Krupaign. After the rout at Valievo the Austrians abandoned Goutchevo without a stand.

The genial young captain who escorted us had once been a comitadji officer, sent by the government to organize revolt—first in Macedonia, and then in Austrian Bosnia and Herzegovina.

"Before we volunteered for comitadji service," he said, "we were sent to the universities in Berlin and Vienna to study the organization of revolutions, particularly of the Italian Risorgimento.

..."

Our road turned to rough country way, deep in mud, then to a mere track where only mules and pedestrians could pass—winding upward through immense oaks and ashes, lost in swift mountain brooks and choked with brush. An hour's hard climb brought us to the summit of the first mountain, from which we could see the precipitous peak of Eminove Vode—"Waters of Emin," as the old Turks named it—rising tremendous from the little valley that lay between, and splendid with the vivid green of young leaves, and great shining knobs of black rock.

In the high valley of the hills the white houses of a village lay half hidden in a sea of riotous plum blossoms. Their windows gaped wide—their doors swung idly to and fro. Behind some wall which we could not see a feminine voice was wailing shrilly, flatly, with hysterical catches, the monotonous song of mourning for the dead. The captain pulled up his horse and hallooed loudly—finally a thin, gaunt woman came slowly through the orchard.

"Have you rackia, sister?" "Ima. I have." She went back and returned with a stone jug and a long-necked vase for us to drink from.

"What is this place?"

"It is the Rich Village of the Rackia-Makers."

"Where are all the people?"

"They are dead, of the spotted heat (typhus)."

We spurred forward through the golden silence, heavy with the scent of the plum-trees and with humming bees. The wailing died behind. Here the travelled road ended, and beyond was a mountain path untravelled save by hunters and the goatherds of high Goutchevo, but now scarred and rutted by the feet of thousands, and the passage of heavy bodies dragged through the rocks and brush.

"By here the army climbed Goutchevo," said the captain, "and those marks are the marks of cannon that we took up there." He pointed to the towering height of Eminove Vode. "Horses were no good here—and the oxen fell dead of fatigue. So we pulled them up by men—a hundred and twenty to each gun."

The path wound upward along the flank of the mountain and through a leaping stream which we waded. Here it ceased; but on the other side the deeply scored hillside rose almost straight for five hundred feet. We dismounted and led the stumbling, winded mountain horses, zigzagging from shelf to shelf of earth and crumbling rock.

"It took them three days to haul the cannon up here," panted the captain.

Resting and walking, and for level spaces riding a short distance, we climbed up through the forest of the mounting crest perhaps a thousand feet higher, over ground strewn with brass cartridge-shells, traceleathers, bits of Serbian uniforms, and the wheels of shattered cannon limbers. Everywhere in the woods were deserted huts thatched with leaves and the branches of trees, and caves in the ground, where the Serbian army had lived for two months in the snow. Higher up we noticed that the lower parts of the trees were covered with leaves, but that their tops were as if dead; slowly as we climbed the dead part descended, until half the forest lifted gaunt, broken spikes where the vicious hail of bullets had torn off their tops—and then came trees naked of branches. We crossed two lines of deep trenches, and emerged on the bare summit of Goutchevo, which had also once been wooded, but where now nothing but jagged stumps studded with glistening lead remained.

On one side of this open space were the Serbian trenches, on the other side the Austrian. Barely twenty yards separated the two. Here and there both trenches merged into immense pits, forty feet around and fifty feet deep, where the enemy had undermined and dynamited them. The ground between was humped into irregular piles of earth. Looking closer, we saw a ghastly thing: from these little mounds protruded pieces of uniform, skulls with dragged hair, upon which shreds of flesh still hung; white bones with rotting hands at the end, bloody bones sticking from boots such as the soldiers wear.

An awful smell hung over the place. Bands of halfwild dogs slunk at the edge of the forest, and far away we could see two tearing at something that lay halfcovered on the ground. Without a word the captain pulled out his revolver and shot. One dog staggered and fell thrashing, then lay still—the other fled howling into the trees; and instantly from the depths of the wood all around came a wolfish, eerie howling in answer, dying away along the edge of the battle-field for miles.

We walked on the dead, so thick were they—sometimes our feet sank through into pits of rotting flesh, crunching bones. Little holes opened suddenly, leading deep down and swarming with gray maggots. Most of the bodies were covered only with a film of earth, partly washed away by the rain—many were not buried at all. Piles of Austrians lay as they had fallen in desperate charge, heaped along the ground in attitudes of terrible action. Serbians were among them. In one place the half-eaten skeletons of an Austrian and a Serbian were entangled, their arms and legs wrapped about each other in a deathgrip that could not even now be loosened. Behind the front line of Austrian trenches was a barbed-wire barricade, significant of the spirit of the men pinned in that death-trap—for they were mostly Serbians from the Austrian Slav provinces, driven at the point of a revolver to fight their brothers.

For six miles along the top of Goutchevo the dead were heaped like that—ten thousand of them, said the captain. From here we could see for forty miles around—the green mountains of Bosnia across the silver Drina, little white villages and flat roads, planes of fields green and yellow with new crops and brown with ploughing, and the towers and bright houses of Austrian Svornik, gleaming among lovely trees at the bend of the river; southward in long lines that seemed to move, so living were they, lifted and broke the farther peaks of Goutchevo, along which wriggled to the end of vision the double line of trenches and the sinister field between...

We rode through fruit orchards heavy with blossoms, between great forests of oaks and beeches and blooming chestnuts; under high wooded hills, whose slopes broke into a hundred rippling mountain meadows that caught the sun like silk. Everywhere springs poured from the hollows, and clear streams leaped down canyons choked with verdure, from Goutchevo, which the Turks called "Mountain of Waters"—from Goutchevo, saturated with the rotting dead. All this part of Serbia was watered by the springs of Goutchevo; and on the other side they flowed into the Drina, thence into the Save and the Danube, through lands where millions of people drank and washed and fished in them. To the Black Sea flowed the poison of Goutchevo....

Late in the afternoon we descended into the main highroad to Valievo, by which the Austrian army had entered the heart of the country, and at evening, clattered down the main street of the white little village of Krupaign, where the subprefect, the chief of police, the president of the town, and the officers of the divisional staff came to meet us, dressed in their best uniforms. Our dinner consisted of roast young pig torn in fragments, beer, wine, rackia, cognac, and pitta smesson, chopped meat fried in greasy pastry.

Through the warm dark of the spring evening came the squealing of bagpipes, the stamping and shuffling of feet, and short, wild shouts. We leaned from the window. Up the cobbled street marched a big gypsy with the Serbian pipes swelling under his arm, and behind him came hundreds of soldiers, hand in hand, sidling along in a sort of rough polka step—the kolo, which is danced all over this part of the world. They swayed along, whooping, until they reached the village square; there they formed a huge, irregular circle, with the gypsy in the middle. The tune changed to a swifter, wilder measure. The dancers flung their legs high and leaped faster in all sorts of variations—each one the specialty of a different village—and as they danced they sang a short chorus with much laughter.

"Every Sunday the peasants all over Serbia gather in their village squares and dance the kolo," explained the captain. "There are kolos for marriages, kolos for christenings, kolos for every occasion. And each political party has a separate kolo for elections. This one they are dancing now is the Radical kolo (the government in power)—and the song they are singing is the Radical song:

"If you will pay my taxes for me
Then I will vote for you!..."

At a quarter to five in the morning our breakfast appeared—a glass of cognac, a glass of tea, and a tiny cup of Turkish coffee. This was to last us perhaps all day, for between here and Valievo was all devastated country. At five we climbed into an oxcart covered over with a bowed top of matting like the roof of a prairie-schooner, so low that we could not sit up straight. The wagon was not only springless, but built so that every unevenness was magnified one hundred times and communicated to every part. And our route lay over the worst road in Serbia, now rendered impassable by the double passage of two great armies in the winter. The greater part of the trip consisted of a jolting crawl over huge boulders lying in bottomless mud—and eighty kilometres he between Krupaign and Valievo.

"Haidel!" roared the driver, lashing the horses. He was a miserably dressed soldier, dirty and covered with fleas—who soon were holding a banquet on Robinson and me. We tore down the cobbled street at a terrible pace, bouncing up to the roof with shaking bones, in the frightful clatter of the cart over the rocks.

"See those horses go!" cried the soldier, beaming with pride. "The finest horses in all Serbia! This stallion I have named Voyvoda Michitch, and the mare, I call her King Peter."

He pulled up with a flourish at the last cafe in the village, got down and sat down at a table, rapping loudly for a glass of wine. And there he stayed for half an hour, embracing the hostess, patting the children on the head, and sipping his wine amid an admiring circle of girls who greeted his sallies with giggles. Finally we fell furiously upon Johnson, demanding that he call the driver.

"Excuse me, sair!" returned our guide. "You must have patience. Theesiswar!"

Off again at top speed, bouncing over the stones and sinking in the mud.

"I am behind time!" explained the driver. "We must hurry!"

"Well, why did you stay at that cafe so long?"

He stared at us with bland surprise. "Because I wanted to talk and drink!"

Finally the horses were too tired to run, and the road became so horrible that we walked, the drivers pulling at the bridles with shouts, and lashing their beasts through mire and over heaps of great stones.

All along the d6bris of the Austrian retreat still littered both sides of the way—hundreds of transport wagons, cannon limbers, broken guns, heaps of rusty rifles and of unshot cartridges, uniforms, caps, hairy knapsacks, and leather ammunition-belts. The road ran along the edge of a canyon through which a river fell down the valley. A sickening stench rose from it. Into this river had been thrown the bodies of men and horses found dead along the line of the retreat. Here the river widened out and poured thunderously over an immense dam; and looking down, we could see the clear water running above a mass of sodden cloth and bodies bloated gray—from the falls themselves a bone stuck straight out, with strings of flesh and pieces of clothing waving in the current.

This nightmare journey continued for five hours, until we reached the hideous, ruined, looted village of Zavlake. Faint with hunger, we besought Johnson to get something to eat. He roused himself from a light slumber and began: "Excuse me, sair! Thees is"

"I don't care whether it's war or not!" screamed Robinson. "You get out and rustle some eggs! Haidel!"

We got our eggs and again started. All that day we crawled down the valley, which is nothing but a fifty-mile grave of dead Austrians.

Late at night we rounded a wooded hill where the camp-fires of the first army stretched under immense oak-trees for miles, and the soldiers lay about them singing epics of the war, and found ourselves in the streets of Valievo.

Valievo had been one of the worst typhus pestholes in all Serbia. Even now, when the disease had diminished so greatly, the streets of Valievo were nothing but avenues of hospitals. We were taken to one of these.

"Now," said the Serbian doctor who was in charge, "you shall see a good Serbian hospital. You have seen the bad ones, where we were hampered by the lack of all necessities. But my hospital is equal to the American hospital at Belgrade."

We entered a whitewashed hall, clean as it could be made, and smelling of disinfectant. In the wards, where the patients had each his own bed and lay in clean blankets in new clean night-clothes, all the windows were open to the sun and air. The doctor put on a white blouse over his uniform, washed his hands with sublimate, and made us do the same. We were enchanted. But in the centre of the hospital was an open-air court, whitewashed with lime, where the convalescents walked slowly about. At one side was a small open shed, and within lay five dead men, clothed in the filthy rags in which they had entered the hospital. They had lain there for two days, for Serbians will not bury a man until a coffin is made—and in Valievo the coffin-makers were behind with their orders. On the other side of the court were the open toilets. And the court sloped down to the middle, where was the well for drinking water!

Here was a horrible room full of men with posttyphus gangrene, that awful disease that follows typhus in almost fifty per cent of soldier cases, in which the flesh rots away and the bones crumble. The only hope of stopping it is by amputating the afflicted part—and this room was full of men without arms and legs, of men with rotting faces and breasts. They moaned and screamed, crying, "Kuku Mayka! Holy Mother, help me!" For most of them there was nothing to be done. Their flesh would slough away until it reached their hearts or brains, and death would come in dreadful agony.

We wandered around Valievo for two days, noting the sanitary measures that had been taken to stop the epidemic. They consisted largely in HOW IS IT WITH THEE-O SERBIA. MY DEAR MOTHER?" throwing disinfectant over everything. In the street and in every courtyard were piles of filth and garbage. Little attempt had been made to remove these; there were even new piles on top of the old—but freshly sprinkled with lime. This is the key to the Serbian attitude toward sanitation. They do not understand it—they haven't the slightest conception what it means. It is something modern, something European, something that the civilized world uses to prevent disease; so they splash disinfectant about, with a half-contemptuous sneer at people who are so cowardly as to take such precautions, and go on accumulating filth as they always have done.

We went down to the railway-station late at night, to take the train for Nish and Russia. In the light of blue electric arcs, long chains of Austrian prisoners were unloading flour to feed the desolate country until the harvests could be sown and gathered. And as we waited on the platform, I thought with wonder of these Serbians, their origin, and their destiny. They alone of all the Balkan peoples have been one unmixed race since first they came into this country eight centuries ago—and they alone have built their own civilization, unmodified by any other. The Romans had a string of mountain fortresses through the region—they settled no colonies here. The Crusaders passed them by. They held their narrow passes against the Tartars of Bulgaria, the Dacians of Rumania, the Huns and Tcheks of the North—and long before their neighbors, with the armed help of European nations, threw off the yoke of the Turk, Serbia made herself free. When Europe imposed foreign dynasties on Bulgaria, Rumania, and Greece, Serbia was ruled by her own house. With such a stock, with such a history, with the imperialistic impulse growing daily, hourly, in the hearts of her peasant soldiers, into what tremendous conflicts will Serbia's ambition lead her!

There was a soldier standing on guard at the platform—a tall, wiry, bearded man, dressed in the fragments of a uniform and shoes with sandals of cowhide and high socks embroidered with flowers. He was leaning on an Austrian rifle, staring out over the heads of the sweating workmen to those dim mountains lost in the dark beyond. And as he looked he sang, swaying lightly to the rhythm, that most ancient Serbian ballad of all, which begins:

"How is it with thee, O Serbia, my dear mother?"

III RUSSIA RUSSIA'S BACK DOOR AT the end of May the Russian army, to the astonishment of the world, had covered more than two hundred miles on its stupendous retreat from the Carpathians. In Bucovina it abandoned Czernewitz before the formidable Austrian drive, and withdrew behind the River Pruth. We decided to cross the frontier where Rumanian Moldavia, Austrian Bucovina, and Russian Bessarabia meet at the bend of the river, and try to strike the Russian front in action.

From Dorohoi, the northern terminus of the Rumanian railway, it is twenty miles over the hills to the frontier. We bargained for a four-horse coach; but the chief of police of Dorohoi smiled and shook his head.

"You cannot pass the frontier without permission from the high authorities," he said; "the Rumanian custom-house is closed." He looked us over thoughtfully. "However, I am going across to Russia myself to-night, and you can come with me in my automobile if you like. I will introduce you to the commandant of Novo Sielitza, which is the headquarters of the Third Army.... He is a close friend of mine—I often visit him. The Russians are hospitable people. By the way, they will be grateful to you over there if you bring a little something alcoholic."

Joyously we sallied forth and bought cognac and dismissed our coach. And just as gray evening flooded the world after a day of rain, and the clouds rolled back like curtains, piling up to golden pinnacles in a shallow green sky, our machine roared out from the dripping forest of Hertza, and we could see beyond the white walls and thatched roofs of a little village the rolling miles of hills, emerald with wheat glittering wetly, black with forests, smoking with the sweat of fat earth after rain; and farther still, to the left, the rolling green and gold and brown country of Bucovina—to the right, the plain beyond the Pruth, low hills and higher hills behind—Russian Bessarabia. On the Austrian side, far away, were visible white winding roads, dazzling villas set in green, an occasional shining town—order and prosperity; on the Russian side, the wet tin roofs of a clump of wooden shacks, thatched huts the color of dirt, a wandering muddy track which served as a road—the very reverse. In all the vast landscape nothing moved, except a mysterious black smoke slowly rising from behind the hill, which is Czernewitz, and steam from a whistling train at Novo Sielitza. But the air trembled with deep, lazy sound—the cannon firing somewhere beyond vision along the Pruth.

Just ahead the river itself came in view between hills, here and there, shining dully like old brass. We swooped down with screaming siren through the vil 3 a:

In the village of Hertza, where the peasants, clad in white linen all embroidered with flowers, were gathered on the green for their evening songs and dances and lifted their broad-brimmed hats to us—down, through vineyards and cornfields, to Mamornitza on the bank of the muddy river.

Over all the west the sunset made a fierce flame, edging the toppling clouds with fire, pouring green gold over the fields. The radiance faded; by the time we reached the riverside it was quite dark, except for a broad red band low down in the northern sky. Against this reared a tumble-down shed set in a bar-ren waste of sand, stones, and mud—where the Pruth roared in the spring floods. But it was Russia, Holy Russia—sombre, magnificent, immense, incoherent, unknown even to herself.

They had been notified at the deserted customhouse, and in a room musty with long neglect a shabby little man visaed our passports. Escorted by two soldiers, we picked our way down to the river, where a flat-bottomed scow lay half full of water, and a rope fastened to the bank stretched out into the darkness—to Russia! We couldn't see the other side, but as we swung out into the brown current, the Rumanian shore glided astern and disappeared; for a moment we were adrift on a boundless sea, and then against the dim, red sky something rose and loomed—a giant soldier with a long-bayoneted rifle, the crown of his hat peaked up in front as only Russians wear it. Beside him was the shadowy form of a two-horsed carriage.

Without a word the sentry put our baggage into the carriage and we followed. He leaped to the box—we were off through deep sand, whip cracking... A sudden guttural hail from the dark, and another huge soldier bulked in the night beside the carriage. Our sentry handed him a slip of paper, which he pretended to read, holding it upside down—although it was now quite dark and he quite illiterate.

"Koracho! Good!" he grunted and waved us on. "Pajal'st'!"

The last red light had faded from the sky, and we rattled through a starless gloom troubled with the confused sounds of an army at rest. Far away on our right accordions jiggled flatly, and a mighty chorus of deep voices swelled in a slow, stern song.

To the left suddenly opened a meadow bright with many fires. Horses were picketed all about—in one corner two stallions strained, screaming, at thenropes. High saddles, sleeping-rugs of rich color, brass samovars lay on the ground, and on the flames copper pots smoked. In little knots at the fires, flat-faced, swarthy men squatted, Eastern fashion, between their knees—men with Chinese eyes and cheek-bones polished like teak, robed in long caftans and crowned with towering shaggy hats of fur. The twanging, indolent sound of their speech reached us. One stood upright in the firelight, which gleamed on the silver bosses of his belt and the long curved yataghan inlaid with gold that hung by his side.

"Turkmiene," explained the soldier on the box.

Turcomans from beyond the Caspian, from the steppes of Asia—the boiling geyser that deluged Europe with the great Mongolian invasions—the mysterious cradle of humankind. The fathers of these warriors followed Ghenghis Khan and Tamerlane and Attila. Their cousins were Sultans in Constantinople, and sat upon the Dragon Throne in Peking. One glimpse we had of them, a tiny handful in the mighty hordes that Russia is pouring down on the West—and then we were among the ruins of Austrian Nova Sielitza, the old frontier.

Here the gaping windows of roofless houses, walls charred and toppling, immense customs warehouses crumpled with fire. The Russians had wrecked everything at the beginning of the war—what became of the people we didn't like to think. A big stucco hotel had been struck by a bursting shell; light shone from within, and big-booted soldiers in blouses stood silhouetted in the doorways. The road we drove on was white and smooth. Shadowy horsemen jingled past, stray light catching the guardless hilts of Cossack swords. Gleaming white linen in the gloom marked Moldavian peasants shuffling along, laughing and speaking gently their Italianate dialect.

A bridge with another sentry, who waved us by when he saw the flash of white paper—now we were in Russian Novo Sielitza. Here there was no destruction; but instead of a hard road, we rocked through a wide expanse of muddy pools and dried ruts, scored with a thousand tracks. At each side of this street was a deep ditch for drainage and sewage, spanned by wooden footbridges. Wide, sprawling wooden houses alternated with blocks of tiny Jewish shops, swarming with squealing, whining, bargaining people, and emitting that stale stench that we know on New York's lower East Side. Old Jews in long overcoats, derby hats resting on their ears, scraggly beards, elbows and hands gesticulating—the comedy Jew in a burlesque show—filthy babies crawling in the lamplight, rows of women in Mother Hubbards and brown wigs, nursing their babies and gossiping shrill Yiddish on the door-step.

We swung into a side street, black as pitch, lined on either side by long wooden houses behind picket fences.

"Here we are," said our guide. "Now you will see a real Russian house and family."

The door popped open and a stout, bearded officer stood on the threshold holding a lamp over his head—Captain Vladimir Constantinovitch Madji, commandant of Novo Sielitza. Behind was a bristling bald-headed man with fierce white mustache and goatee, and over his shoulder appeared a grinning face like the face of a very fat little boy, smoking a cigarette, a white silk kerchief wound tightly around its forehead.

"Please! Please! Pavlim!" said the captain in Rumanian, making gestures of welcome. "Pajal'st I!" cried the others in Russian.

The chief of police explained that he had brought two friends, Amerikanska; they burst forth into another delighted chorus of "Povtim! Pajal'st J!" and pushed out to look at us, talking rapid Russian.

"They speak neither Russian nor Rumanian. Only French" "Entrez!" said the captain, with an elementary accent; then in just as amateurish German: "Kommen Sie herein, meine Herren!" "Voildl Comment I Comment! Voila!" the bald-headed man roared.

"It is all my brother knows of French!" explained Madji, as we entered. The fat face turned out to belong to a girl of astonishing corpulence and terrific exuberance. Puffing furiously at her cigarette, she squeezed both our hands, grasped the lapels of our coats and shook us, shouting Russian remarks, and laughing uproariously when we didn't understand.

The captain radiated hospitality. "Alexandra Alexandrovna, get the samovar!"

She ran off, bellowing orders to invisible servants. "Antonina Feodorovna! Prinissitie samovaroul!" And in a moment she was back with a new yellow kerchief around her head, a new cigarette, puffing clouds of smoke.

Madji indicated her with his hand. "Mon mari I My husband!" he said in his bad French.

His brother pranced up like a little old stallion, also pointing to her; he repeated "My husband!" adding in a fierce voice: "Trbs joliel Trhs jolie! Trbs jolie I!" He said "trbs jolie" over and over again, delighted at remembering another French phrase....

As to the fat girl, we never did discover whose "husband" she was.... And there was also Alexandra Antonovna, a solemn little girl of about thirteen with the sophisticated eyes of a grown woman, like all Russian little girls; her status in the household remained a mystery, too. Anyway, it wasn't of the least importance, for this was Russia, where such things don't matter....

In the dining-room we began by drinking glass after glass of tea. Boxes of cigarettes overflowed on the table. At one end sat Alexandra Alexandrovna, lighting one cigarette from another, shaking with laughter and shouting at anybody and everybody. At the other end was the old man, beaming upon us and crying: "Voilal Comment! Trbs jolie!" Antonina the servant shuffled in and out, taking part in the general conversation, arguing every order, bringing fresh water for the samovar—on terms of perfect equality.

Robinson explained to the old man that he looked exactly like Gogol's Cossack hero, Taras Bulba. He was delighted. And from that time on we never addressed him except as "General Taras Bulba."

From time to time other officers dropped in—men in belted Russian blouses buttoned up the neck, their hair cropped close. They kissed Alexandra's hand, and made the rounds of the table, murmuring their names. Most of them spoke some French or

German, and all were astonishingly frank about the situation.

"Yes, we are falling back like the devil. It is mostly because we lack munitions; but there are other things. Graft—disorganization"

A lieutenant broke in: "Do you know the story about Colonel B? He had a bad record in the Japanese War, but when this one broke out he was appointed chief of staff to General Ivanov. It was he who forced the beginning of the retreat from the Carpathians; when Ivanov was absent he ordered the retreat of an entire army corps—exposing the flank of the next army. There wasn't any reason for it. People say he is insane.... However, the thing was hushed up, and he became chief of staff to General Dimitriev and did the same thing over again! You'd think that would finish him? Ah, no! He had powerful friends in Petrograd—and now he is chief of staff to another general!"

Said another calmly: "It is like that. Advance, retreat. Advance, retreat. If we retreat now—why, then, we shall advance again."

"But how long will the war last?"

"What do we care how long it lasts?" remarked a second captain with a grin: "What do we care—so long as England gives money and the earth gives men?"

At about ten o'clock Alexandra suddenly decided to dine. She and Antonina set the table, while Taras Bulba bustled about, giving contradictory orders. For zakouska there were plates of sardines, smoked and raw herrings, tunny, caviar, sausage, shirred eggs, and pickles—to sharpen the appetite—washed down with seven different kinds of liquor: cognac, benedictine, kummel, raspberry and plum brandies, and Kiev and Bessarabian wines. Afterward came great platters of corn-meal polenta, then chunks of pork and potatoes. We were twelve. The company began dinner with wine-glasses full of cognac followed by the others in rotation, and finished with several cups of Turkish coffee and the seven different liquors all over again. Then the samovar was brought, and we settled down to the eternal chat. It was midnight.

"Ah," cried an officer, "if we only had vodka now!"

"Is it really forbidden in Russia?"

"Except in the first-class restaurants of the big cities—Kiev, Odessa, Moscow. You can also get foreign drinks. But they are very expensive.... You see, the object of the ukase was to keep alcohol from the lower classes; the rich can still get it...."

A young fellow named Amethystov, lieutenant in a Crimean Tartar regiment, asked us if we had heard the story of the Bismarck Denkmal.

"It was during the retreat from East Prussia, after Tannenberg," he said, a gentle smile lighting his blank, fanatical face, "and my regiment was at Johannisberg, where there was a bronze statue of Bismarck about twelve feet tall—like hundreds all over Germany. My Tartars wanted to pull it down and take it with them as a trophy, but the general absolutely refused to allow it. 'It would cause an international incident,' said he. As if the war weren't enough of an international incident! Well, so we stole it—pulled it down at night, stood it upright in a field furnace, and covered it over with a tarpaulin. But we couldn't hide the great bronze feet sticking out at the bottom.... We got it as far as Tilsit—and one day the general came riding along the line, and saw the feet!"

"Who took that thing?" he shouts. Oh, how mad he was! In the morning I'll find out the guilty ones, if I have to court-martial the entire regiment! It must be abandoned here—do you understand me?"

"Of course, he had a right to be angry, because we were using four army horses to pull the thing, and we'd had to abandon a lot of baggage because transport was lacking...."

"So that night we took Bismarck out of his cart and set him up in a field, and had a farewell celebration around him. ... I remember we made speeches and broke champagne bottles on him. And next day, lo and behold, he was gone—stolen by a Siberian infantry regiment. ... Who knows where he is now?" he mused. "Perhaps retreating across Galicia with the Siberians."

At the other end of the table a captain of Atamanski Cossacks, his narrow eyes glowing, was saying: "You have seen the hiltless Cossack sword?" He showed us his own. "It is terrible in their hands! They slash with a sidelong stroke—whiz! It cuts a man in half! Beautiful! But they love to kill. When prisoners surrender to them, they say always to their colonel: Agal Let us cut them! It will disgrace us to bring back babies as prisoners!"

We tried to explain our purpose in coming, but the captain always interrupted with an expansive smile:

"You shall go where you please, my friends. Tomorrow we will arrange all that.... Now eat and drink, eat and drink"

Alexandra Alexandrovna screamed pleasantries from a cloud of smoke:

"It's not polite when you come to visit friends, to talk of going away!" "Trte-jolie!" bellowed Taras Bulba. "You shall not leave here until you have taught me to speak French, German, Spanish, Italian, and Chinese! I have a passion for languages"

It was now one o'clock in the morning; we were worn out.

"Voyons!" expostulated Madji. "To sleep is a ridiculous way to pass the night. LIFE AT NOVO SIELITZA

A PLACE had been arranged for us to sleep, and we went in a carriage driven by a soldier. In all the town there were no lights, except in occasional houses where officers were quartered. We pulled up before a crude brick house jammed between huddling Jewish shops, and waded through a puddle that smelled of sewage. The soldier pounded on the door—light grew in the chinks, and a woman's voice whined timorously. He cursed her for a Jew. "Germanski /" he said; "the foreigners!" chains and bolts rattled, and a wave of fetid smell rushed out. The woman was sharp-featured and bent, with a coarse brown wig set awry, cringing in the doorway, her gums bared in an obsequious smile. She led the way up a stairway that had not been cleaned since the Passover, chattering raucous Yiddish:

"Who are the noble Herren? What do they here? Where do they come from? Amerika!" She stopped short and peered down at us in amazement. "Wutirder-bar! I have friends in Amerika—Josef Hertzovici, for example. Do you know him? No, of course not. It is a big land, bigger than this.... How is it to live in Amerika? Much money—heinf! And the tall houses of Neu Yorch. Fifty stories? Grosser Himmel I. .. But why do you leave Amerika and come to Russia?"

"Why do you ask?" I said. "Isn't it good to live here?"

She gave me a suspicious glance, and fell back into a whine:

"There is little gold here, noble gentlemen, and it is hard for the poor.... But it is very pleasant"

She opened a door, first carefully touching a folded paper prayer tacked on the jamb, and on tiptoe motioned us to follow. In the corner at a table sat an aged Jew in skull-cap, black robe, and heelless slippers, reading the Torah by candle-light. His bleary eyes peered down through horn spectacles, and his white beard moved to the low droning of the sacred words. He turned half around, without looking at us, and bowed with venerable dignity.... A most holy Rebbe I

Our room lay beyond, furnished with two couches of the shape and consistency of marble slabs in the morgue. True, there was clean linen, but it smelled strongly of gefälfesisch...

We had a balcony jutting out over a wide square of mud and garbage and trampled straw, where the peasants parked their springless carts when they came to town. Deep ditches surrounded it, carrying a slow stream of evil-smelling drainage, and on all sides were rows of miserable huts where the Jews lived. In that square all day long moved a dramatic pageant of races—sometimes significant, sometimes incoherent and obscure. There were subdued, gentle Moldavian peasants all in white linen, with wide-brimmed, lowcrowned hats and long, curling hair falling upon their shoulders; and their wives, crowned with the round marital "pill-box" under their kerchiefs—big, freemoving creatures with stalwart legs bare to the knees. Russian tnujiks in blouses and peaked caps clumped along with heavy boots—bearded giants with blank, simple faces, and hale, flat-faced Russian women dressed in ghastly combinations of colored kerchiefs and shirts—one wore yellow and cerise, another vermilion, apple-green, and baby-blue. Here and there the twisted, calculating face of a Russian pope, with his long hair, and a great crucifix dancing on the front of his robe. Cossacks of the Don without distinctive uniform except a broad red stripe down their trousers, silver-inlaid sabre with the guardless hilt, and tufted love-lock over the left eye; pockmarked Tartars, descendants of the Golden Horde who stormed Holy Moscow—the strong men of the army—marked by a narrow red stripe; Turcomans in enormous white or black bearskins, caftans of faded violet or blue, boots with pointed toes turned up—splendid with gold chains, inlaid belts, daggers, and yataghans. And always Jews, Jews, Jews: bowed, thin men in rusty derbies and greasy long coats, with stringy beards and crafty, desperate eyes, cringing from police, soldiers and priests, and snarling at the peasants—a hunted people, made hateful by extortion and abuse, by murderous competition in the foul, overcrowded cities of the Pale. Excitable, whining Jewesses in filthy wrappers and coarse wigs; venerable ravs and great scholars bent under the weight of virtuous years, with leather-bound tomes under their arms; sensitivefaced boys who passed repeating their lessons, on the way to heder—a race inbred and poisoned with its narrow learning, because it has been "persecuted for righteousness' sake," and butchered in the streets by men whose banner was the Cross. Jews impregnated the mass—the air smelled of Jews....

Over the patched tin roofs rose the inverted green onion atop the Russian church. A blind peasant boy knelt upright in the mud beneath our balcony, muttering prayers and crossing himself with a fluttering motion. A bawling, bargaining market was in progress in the street beyond. Police in yellow blouses, booted and spurred, strolled watchfully by, fingering the red cords that hung from their necks to their prominent revolvers—bullying Jews, hustling peasants, as is the way of police with the weak all the world over. And unnoticed by the accustomed world, the fetid air shook unceasingly with the sound of big guns, only ten miles away.

At Madji's house the family slouched out one by one, yawning and rubbing their eyes. It was after ten o'clock. In the entry Antonina was chopping up kindling and putting it down the blazing well of the samovar—then she shook in charcoal, filled the teapot with fresh leaves, and we began again the interminable drinking of tea that keeps up all day and all night in Russian houses.

We delicately called the captain's attention to our prospects.

"Of course you may go to the front," he said. "But it is not interesting—unless you care for artillery duels. Now there is a lull in the fighting at this point. To the north it is very severe—why don't you go north?"

We jumped at the chance.

"Where do you want to go?"

Now the American Legation in Bucarest had authorized us to report on the welfare of certain American citizens in the parts of Bucovina and Galicia occupied by the Russians, and I consulted the list. No one knew exactly where the front was—but by calculating the number of miles per day which the Russians were retreating, and consulting the map, we picked out Zalezchik, a town where there were American citizens, as a place likely to be in the zone of action.

Madji took us to staff headquarters to see the general, and he readily gave permission; so the commandant made us out a pass to Zalezchik. What's more, he summoned a Jew who owned a peasant—horse, carriage, body, and soul—and bargained with him for our transportation. The price was twentyfive roubles, paid in advance—of which the peasant probably received two. And we were to start at six in the morning.

Colonel Doshdovsky, the one-armed Russian commander of all the Turcomans, wore the cross of St. George, and the first and second class of the Order of Vladimir—for he was a great hero—and his vicious Turcoman sword was covered with Persian verses inlaid with gold. With him we inspected the Turcoman camp. The warriors lived under an open shed in the field where their horses were picketed, each horse singly—for they were all savage stallions. Never had I seen such beautiful horses—lithe, strong, cleanmuscled, with the arched necks and small heads of horses of race. Here and there their riders worked over them—polishing and clipping their hoofs, combing their manes, going over their glossy hides minutely with pinchers to pull out hairs longer or shorter than the others, swaddling them in blankets.

"They must furnish their own horses," said the colonel; "and their horses are their pride. The horse often represents its owner's entire fortune. If it is killed in a little skirmish of patrols, the poor fellow is ruined. Turcomans are liable for military service all their lives."

Many had taken off their long caftans, revealing the thin black undergarment, laced tight at the waist, that fell to their baggy red trousers. Others had doffed the great fur hats—and beneath was a brown head shaved bald except for a scalp-lock on the crown, covered by a little silk skull-cap. High saddles bossed with silver lay around, bundles of rich-colored cloths from Khiva and Bokhara and Samarcand, sleepingrugs and praying-rugs whose weave and color are secrets of the dead. They wore twisted silver chains down their backs, wide sashes of brilliant silk, straight and curved daggers inlaid with precious metals, and swords in richly ornamented scabbards that perhaps Tamerlane had seen. On us they turned their slanting Mongolian eyes, indifferently, with the incurious superiority of world-conquerors, and made smiling, sardonic comments to each other. But Robinson got out his pad and sketched their portraits, and gave them away—and they crowded to pose like eager children.

All day long at Madji's tea flowed, and meals followed haphazard, and people drifted in and out. Alexandra Alexandrovna shouted and laughed and smoked incessantly, changing her kerchief twenty times. Taras Bulba insisted on learning French, Spanish, and German all at once, and blustered fiercely and ineffectually about. The captain himself was busy and distraught—there were several important matters to settle; staff-officers came in with bundles of papers and crowded his office, all talking loudly at once. There seemed to be no method. They all straggled from room to room, drinking tea and gossiping of indifferent things. Madji would determinedly seize pen and paper as if to work, then forget all about it, and come into the dining-room to hear some funny story that was being shouted. A new crowd of officers were there for dinner, which happened just as unexpectedly as the night before, and half an hour later—but since we were to rise so early, we tore ourselves from those hospitable hands. Alexandra, the captain, and old Taras Bulba came to the door to say good-by. Madji beamed and wished us all good luck; Alexandra squeezed our hands with exaggerated feeling, and besought us to come back—surely. As for old Taras Bulba, he appeared overcome with the effort of searching for a proper French phrase. Just as we mounted the carriage he found it. His face lighted up; he assumed a rhetorical attitude, extended one arm with a superb gesture, and said sternly: "Je vous aime—je vous adore !" BREAKING INTO BUCOVINA EARLY the next morning we came out of our lodgings to the shrill sound of Yiddish blessings and reproaches mixed, and found the Jew smirking and rubbing his hands.

"Where's the carriage?" I asked, suspecting further extortion. The Jew pointed to a temporary scaffolding such as is used for digging artesian wells, upon which sat an incredibly discouraged-looking mujik. On closer inspection we discovered wheels, fastened to arbitrary places with bits of wire and rope; and apparently unattached to the structure, two aged and disillusioned horses leaned against each other.

"B-r-r-r-r-r!" said the mujik to these animals, implying that they would run away if he didn't. "B-r-r-r-r!"

We mounted, while the Jew abusively impressed upon his driver that we were to be taken to Zalezchik, through Boyan and Zastevna; he also told him to get whatever money he could out of us. ... At the end of this tirade, the peasant rose and stolidly beat the horses with a long string fastened to a stick, shouting hoarsely: "Ugh! Eeagh! Augh!" The horses awoke, sighed, and moved experimentally—by some mechanical miracle the wheels turned, a shudder ran along our keel, and we were off!

Across the bridge into Austrian Novo Sielitz we rattled, and out upon the hard road that led frontward, slowly gaining upon and passing a long train of ox-carts driven by soldiers and loaded with cases of ammunition. Now we were in Bucovina. On the left, low fields green with young crops stretched flatly to the trees along the Pruth, beyond which rose the rich hills of Rumania; to the right the valley extended miles to cultivated rolling country. Already the June sun poured down windless, moist heat. The driver slumped gradually into his spine, the horses' pace diminished to a merely arithmetical progression, and we crawled in a baking pall of dust like Zeus hidden in his cloud.

"Hey!" We beat upon his back. "Shake a leg, Dave!"

He turned upon us a dirty, snub-nosed face, and eyes peering through matted hair, and his mouth cracked slowly in an appalling, familiar grin—with the intelligent expression of a loaf of bread. We christened him immediately Ivan the Horrible....

"Ooch!" he cried with simulated ferocity, waving the string. "Aich! Augh!"

The horses pretended to be impressed, and broke into a shuffle; but ten minutes later Ivan was again rapt in contemplation of the infinite, the horses almost stationary, and we moved in white dust....

Slowly we drew near the leisurely sound of the cannon, that defined itself sharply out of the allechoing thunder audible at Novo Sielitza. And top ping a steep hill crowned with a straggling thatched village, we came in sight of the batteries. They lay on the hither side of an immense rolling hill, where a red gash in the fields dribbled along for miles. At intervals of half a minute a gun spat heavily; but you could see neither smoke nor flame—only minute figures running about, stiffening, and again springing to life. A twanging drone as the shell soared—and then on the leafy hills across the river puffs of smoke unfolding. Over there were the towers of white Czernowitz, dazzling in the sun. The village through which we passed was populous with great brown soldiers, who eyed us sullenly and suspiciously. Over a gateway hung a Red Cross flag, and along the road trickled a thin, steady stream of wounded—some leaning on their comrades, others bandaged around the head, or with their arms in slings; and peasant carts jolted by with faintly groaning heaps of arms and legs....

The road slanted down until we were close to the crashing batteries. For hours we drove along behind a desultory but gigantic artillery battle. Gun after gun after gun, each in its raw pit, covered with brush to shield it from aeroplanes. Sweating men staggered under the weight of shells, moving about the shining caissons; methodically the breech snapped home and the pointer singsonged his range; a firer jerked the lanyard—furious haze belched out, gun recoiled, shell screamed—miles and miles of great cannon in lordly syncopation.

In the very field of the artillery peasants were calmly ploughing with oxen, and in front of the roaring guns a boy in white linen drove cattle over the hill toward the pastures along the river. We met long-haired farmers, with orange poppies in their hats, unconcernedly driving to town. Eastward the world rolled up in another slow hill that bore curved fields of young wheat, running in great waves before the wind. Its crest was torn and scarred with mighty excavations, where multitudinous tiny men swarmed over new trenches and barbed-wire tangles. This was the second-line position preparing for a retreat that was sure to come....

We swung northward, away from the artillery, over the bald shoulder of a powerful hill. Here the earth mounted in magnificent waves, patterned with narrow green, brown, and yellow fields that shimmered under the wind. Through valleys whose sides fell like a bird's swoop were vistas of checkered slopes and copses soft with distance. Far to the west the faint blue crinkly line of the Carpathians marched across the horizon. Tree-smothered villages huddled in the immense folds of the land—villages of clay houses unevenly and beautifully moulded by hand, painted spotless white with a bright blue stripe around the bottom, and elaborately thatched. Many were deserted, smashed, and black with fire—especially those where Jews had lived. They bore marks of wanton pillage—for there had been no battle here—doors beaten in, windows torn out, and lying all about the wreckage of mean furniture, rent clothing. Since the beginning of the war the Austrians had not come here. It was Russian work....

Peasants smiling their soft, friendly smile took off their hats as we went by. A gaunt man with a thin baby in his arms ran forward and kissed my hand when I gave him a piece of chocolate. Along the roadside stood hoary stone crosses inscribed with sacred verses in the old Slavonic, before which the peasants uncovered and crossed themselves devoutly. And there were rude wooden crosses, as in Mexico, to mark the spots where men had been assassinated....

In a high meadow overlooking the distant river and the far-rolling plains of Bucovina we came upon a camp of Turcomans—their saddled horses staked to graze and their fires burning. Cruel-faced and slanteyed, they squatted about the cook-pots or moved among the horses, barbaric notes of color in this green northern field, where, perhaps, their ancestors had camped with Attila a thousand years ago. Beyond the river cousins of theirs lay in the enemy's trenches—beyond the ethereal mountains in the west was Hungary, the rich land where the scourges of God from Asia had finally come to rest. Where the road dipped again into the valley was an old stone chapel, circular in form and surrounded by a graceful colonnade. It was now gutted, and the horses of Turcoman officers were stabled inside....

At any cross-roads we always knew the right road to take, because Ivan invariably took the other. Although born and bred at Novo Sielitza, fifteen miles away, he had never travelled so far abroad. Worse, his porous memory could no longer hold the name of our destination, no matter how often he repeated it. Every little while he turned and peered at us, groaning. "Zalezchik!" we shouted in chorus, and he fell to larping the horses with uncouth cries, He pulled up sometimes, until we pointed to a native and made signs for him to ask the way.

"Good day," mumbled Ivan. "Which is the road to?"

"The road to where, friend?" asked the man.

Ivan scratched his head.

"Where do you want to go?"

Ivan grinned sheepishly.

"Zalezchik!" we bawled—and Ivan repeated— "Ah, yes, Zalezchik!"

At noon, we zigzagged up a steep mountain into a pine forest, and met a long train of trucks coming down, loaded with the steel floats of a pontoon bridge. Big Don Cossacks on wiry ponies escorted it, their hair-tufts sticking rakishly out under their caps.

"Aie, Barin!" shouted one of the drivers, pointing southwest. "Eto Truth? IsthathePruth?"

I nodded.

"Two days!" he cried, patting his pontoon. "Two days we cross the river.. .. Czernowitz!"

Still they passed, clanging along the top of the mountain. We plunged down through the forest, meeting the great wagons crawling up with shouts and snapping whips. Steeper and steeper; the trees thinned, and suddenly fell away altogether, and the tremendous panorama of the valley of the Dniester opened out—squares and parallelograms and arcs of variegated color clashing and weaving in a mighty tapestry of fertile fields, great rounded folds of earth sweeping grandly like the ground swell, rambling white granges ship-like along the ribbony roads, and villages lost in the hollows. The pontoon-trucks staggered up, drawn each by eight horses and twenty soldiers who pushed, shouting in unison—for a mile down the hill the road was filled with lumbering big floats rocking from side to side, straining horses flecked with white foam, broad-shouldered men curbed with an agony of effort....

Now we were entering a new land. Though the peasants still wore white linen, their head-dress changed; some wore tall round caps of black fur, others high, bell-crowned hats such as Welsh women used to wear. The Slavonic crosses gave away to tall Catholic crucifixes, decked with all the instruments of the Passion—the spear, the sponge, the gloves, the hammer. We met people who spoke no Rumanian—Polish began to replace it. Granges where whole patriarchal families had lived stood along the road—immense houses containing livingrooms, stables, barns all under one roof, with a road running through the middle of the building from front to back. It was a blasted country, seared with battle, and with the triple passing of two great armies. The trampled grain was sickly yellow in the fields; whole villages in ruins gaped empty, except for Russian soldiers, and few men were to be seen except the aged and crippled—only women and children, with furtive eyes and sunken faces. In the fields among the growing crops old trenches crumbled in, and rusty barbed-wire entanglements straggled through the wheat everywhere. For miles along the left side of the road gigantic new trenches and artillery positions were building in frantic haste. Thousands of soldiers swarmed over the landscape, the afternoon sun flashing on their lifted spades. Wagons loaded with tools and barbed wire impeded the road. Near Zastevna, we saw peasant women and children digging under the superintendence of non-commissioned officers, a long file of them carrying out the dirt in head baskets. Why this feverish activity here, twenty miles behind the positions occupied by the Russians only a month before?

ZALEZCHIK THE TERRIBLE IT was on the other side of Zastevna, where we stopped beside some ruined houses for a drink, that we saw the Austrian prisoners. They came limping along the road in the hot sun, about thirty of them, escorted by two Don Cossacks on horseback; gray uniforms white with dust, bristly faces drawn with fatigue. One man had the upper left-hand part of his face bound up, and the blood had soaked through; another's hand was bandaged, and some jerked along on improvised crutches. At a sign from the Cossacks, who dismounted, they reeled and stumbled to the side of the road, and sullenly threw themselves down in the shade. Two dark-faced men snarled at each other like beasts. The man with the wounded head groaned. He with the bandaged hand began tremblingly to unwrap the gauze. The Cossacks good-naturedly waved us permission to talk with them, and we went over with handfuls of cigarettes. They snatched at them with the avidity of smokers long deprived of tobacco—all except one haughty-faced youth, who produced a handsome case crammed with gold-tipped cigarettes, declined ours frigidly, and took one of his own, without offering any to the others.

"He is a Count," explained a simple, peasantfaced boy with awe.

The man with the wounded hand had got his bandage off at last, and was staring at his bloody palm with a sort of fascination.

"I think this had better be dressed again," said he at last, glancing diffidently at a stout, sulky-looking person who wore a Red Cross arm-band. The latter looked across with lazy contempt and shrugged his shoulders.

"We've got some bandages," I began, producing one. But one of the Cossacks came over, scowling and shaking his head at me. He kicked the Red Cross man with a look of disgust, and pointed to the other. Muttering something, the stout man fumbled angrily in his case, jerked out a bandage, and slouched across.

There were thirty of them, and among that thirty five races were represented: Tcheks, Croats, Magyars, Poles, and Austrians. One Croat, two Magyars, three Tcheks could speak absolutely not a word of any language but their own, and, of course, none of the Austrians knew a single word of Bohemian, Croatian, Hungarian, or Polish. Among the Austrians were Tyroleans, Viennese, and a half-Italian from Pola. The Croats hated the Magyars, and the Magyars hated the Austrians—and as for the Tcheks, no one would speak to them. Besides, they were all divided up into sharply defined social grades, each of which snubbed its inferiors.... As a sample of Franz Joseph's army the group was most illuminating.

They had been taken in a night attack along the Pruth, and marched more than twenty miles in two days. But they were all enthusiastic in praise of their Cossack guards.

"They are very considerate and kind," said one man. "When we stop for the night the Cossacks personally go around to each man, and see that he is comfortable. And they let us rest often.. ."

"The Cossacks are fine soldiers," another broke in; "I have fought with them, and they are very brave. I wish we had cavalry like them!"

A young volunteer of the Polish legion asked eagerly if Rumania was coming in. We replied that it seemed like it, and suddenly he burst out, quivering:

"My God! My God! What can we do? How long can this awful war last? All we want is peace and quiet and rest! We are beaten—we are honorably beaten. England, France, Russia, Italy, the whole world is against us. We can lay down our arms with honor now! Why should this useless butchery go on?"

And the rest sat there, gloomily listening to him, without a word....

Toward evening we were rattling down a steep gully between high cliffs. A stream plunged down beside the road, turning a hundred water-wheels whose milk lay shattered by artillery fire; shacks in partial ruin shouldered each other along the gully, and on top of the eastern cliff we could see disembowelled trenches and an inferno of twisted, snarled barbed wire, where the Russians had bombarded and stormed the Austrian defenses a month before. Hundreds of men were at work up there clearing away the wreckage and building new works. We rounded a corner suddenly and came out upon the bank of the Dniester, just below where the tall railroad bridge plunged into the water its tangle of dynamited girders and cables. Here the river made a huge bend, beneath earthen cliffs a hundred feet high, and across a pontoon bridge choked with artillery the once lovely town of Zalezchik lay bowered in trees. As we crossed, naked Cossacks were swimming their horses in the current, shouting and splashing, their powerful white bodies drenched with golden light....

Zalezchik had been captured, burned, and looted three times by two armies, shelled for fifteen days, and the major portion of its population wiped out by both sides because it had given aid and comfort to the enemy. Night was falling when we drove into the market-place, surrounded with the shocking debris of tall houses. A sort of feeble market was going on there under miserable tilted shacks, where sad-eyed peasant women spread their scanty vegetables and loaves of bread, the centre of a mob of soldiers. A few Jews slunk about the corners. Ivan demanded a hotel, but the man smiled and pointed to a tall crumbling brick wall with "Grand Hotel" painted boldly across it—all that remained. Where could we get something to eat?

"Something to eat? There is not enough food in this town to feed my wife and children."

An atmosphere of terror hung over the place—we could feel it in the air. It was in the crouching figures of the Jews, stealing furtively along the tottering walls; in the peasants as they got out of the way of our carriage, doffing their hats; in the faces of cringing children, as soldiers went by. It got dark, and we sat in the carriage, debating what to do.

An "Apteka"—apothecary shop—stood on the corner, comparatively undamaged, with a light inside. I found the druggist alone, a Jew who spoke German.

"What are you?" he asked suspiciously, peering at me.

"An American."

"There is no hotel here," he burst out suddenly. "There is no place to stay and nothing to eat. A month ago the Russians came in here—they slaughtered the Jews, and drove the women and children out there." He pointed west. "There is no place here"

"Then," I said, "the military commandant must take care of us. Where can I find him?"

"I will send my assistant with you," he answered. His face stiffened with fear. "You will not say to them what I have told, noble Hen? You will not"

The entry of two Russian soldiers interrupted him, and he rose, addressing me insolently for their benefit:

"I can't drive you out of the shop. It's a public shop. But remember, I assume no responsibility for you. I didn't ask you to come here. I don't know you." For, after all, we might be undesirable people. We bestowed upon Ivan a two-rouble piece, which, after biting, he put away in his pocket with hoarse sounds betokening gratitude. And we left him sitting on his vehicle in the middle of the square, gazing at nothing. When we came out of the Apteka he was still there, hunched over in the same position, and an hour later, when we issued from the colonel's headquarters, he had not moved, though it was quite dark. What was passing in that swampy mind? Perhaps he was trying to remember the name of Novo Sielitza, his home—perhaps he was merely wondering how to get there....

We sat long over dinner with the genial colonel and his staff, chattering politics and gossip in intensely fragmentary German. Among other officers were a young Finnish lieutenant and an old Cossack major with a wrinkled Mongolian face like the pictures of Li Hung Chang, who were very much excited over the sinking of the Lusitania, and sure that America would go to war.

"What can we do for you?" asked the colonel.

We said that we would like to visit this part of the front, if there were any fighting going on.

"That, I am afraid, is impossible from here," he regretted. "But if you will go to Tarnopol, the general commanding this army will surely give you permission. Then you must return here, and I shall be glad to accompany you myself. A train for Tarnopol leaves to-night at eleven."

Could he give us any idea what was happening along the front?

"With pleasure," said he eagerly, telling an orderly to bring the maps. He spread them out on the table. "Now here, near Zadagora, we have ten big guns placed in these positions, to stop the Austrian flanking column that is rolling up from the Pruth. Over here, near Kaluz, the Austrians imagine that we have nothing but cavalry, but in about three days we'll throw three regiments across this little stream at this point"

I remarked that all those maps seemed to be German or Austrian maps.

"Oh, yes," he replied. "At the beginning of the war we had no maps at all of Bucovina or Galicia. We didn't even know the lay of the land until we had captured some...." BEHIND THE RUSSIAN RETREAT in the morning we woke stiff and cramped from the benches of our third-class car, and looked out the window upon the boundless Galician steppe, heavy with golden wheat and with ploughed land deeper than velvet; ten-mile planes of flat earth uptilted gently against horizons where giant windmills rode hull down, like ships at sea. We had made thirty miles in nine hours.

The train whistled triumphantly down long inclines, and panted up slopes where the mounting track was visible for miles and miles. Our car was full of officers making the cheerful hubbub that Russians always make together. And from the ten freightcars full of troops behind came nasal accordion music, the slow roar of big voices singing, shouts and cheers. At little stations where the flat-faced, sombrelly dressed Polish peasants and their bright-kerchiefed, broad-hipped women stared solidly at the train, hundreds of soldiers and officers with teapots jostled each other democratically around the kipiatok—the huge tank of boiling water you find at every Russian railway-station—and there was incessant tea. An officer of high rank, who had an orderly, set up a small brass samovar in the next compartment to ours....

From a strap over his shoulder hung a goldhiked Cossack sword, the gift of the Czar for bravery—it bore also the tassel of the Order of Vladimir. The orderly, probably a mujik from one of his estates, called him familiarly "Ivan Ivanovitch." Presently he came over with true Russian hospitality, and invited us in French to drink a glass of chai. We got to talking about the war.

"Nevertheless, it is impossible to beat Russia," said he.

I objected that Russia had been beaten many times.

"You mean the Japanese War. I served in Manchuria myself, and I think I can tell you why we were beaten. In the first place the peasants knew nothing of the causes of the war, and no one took the trouble to tell them. They had never heard of the Japanese. 'We are not angry with the Japanese, whoever they may be,' said the mujiks. 'Why should we fight them?'

"And then everything was horribly mismanaged. I have seen troops, worn out and half starved by a forty days' railway journey on insufficient food, detrained and sent into battle without an hour's rest. And there was the vodka, too, which we haven't got to reckon with to-day. Before the battle of Mukden I saw whole regiments lying in a drunken sleep on the ground.... It was an unpopular wa—there was no patriotism among the peasants."

"And is there patriotism now?"

"Yes, they are very patriotic—they hate the Germans. You see, most of the agricultural machinery comes from Germany, and this machinery does the work of many men, driving the peasants into the factories at Petrograd and Moscow and Riga and Odessa. Then the Germans flood Russia with cheap goods which undersell Russian products—which causes our factories to shut down and throws thousands out of work. In the Baltic" provinces, too, German landlords own all the soil, and the peasants live miserably.... Wherever in Russia they have no feeling against the Germans, we tell them these things.... Oh, yes, this time the Russians know why they are fighting!"

"So the peasants think that by beating the Germans they will get rid of poverty and oppression?"

He nodded good-humoredly. Robinson and I both had the same thought: if the peasants were going to beat any one, why didn't they begin at home? Afterward we discovered that they were beginning at home.

Late in the morning we stopped within sight of the towers of Tarnopol, alongside a huge hospitaltrain which was marked with the imperial arms and bore the legend: "Sanitary Train, Gift of the Imperatrice Alexandra Feodorovna."

"Come on," said our friend, ordering his baggage out. "We had better change trains. Ours will probably stay here until afternoon."

We swung aboard the hospital-train just as it left, and found ourselves in a little car divided into two compartments by a rough board partition. Wooden bunks were folded up against the sides; in one corner was a stove covered with dirty pots and pans; trunks, a tin wash-basin on a box fastened to the wall, and clothes suspended from nails, gave it the look of a ship's forecabin.

In one compartment sat two middle-aged minor officers, and in the other a stout, comfortable-looking woman and a young girl. The two men and the women were smoking cigarettes, and throwing the butts on the maculate floor; steaming glasses of tea littered the tables; the windows were closed.

The girl spoke German and a little French; the woman was her mother, the grizzled sanitary lieutenant her father, and the second captain of engineers her uncle. Since the beginning of the war ten months ago they had been living in this car, travelling from Vilna and Kiev to the front, and back again with the wounded.

"My mother wouldn't let my father go to the war without her, and she made so much fuss that he took us both.... And my uncle's father-in-law is a Collegiate Assessor and a Judge in the government of Minsk, so he managed to get us this car to live in."

"Have you seen any fighting?"

"Twice," she answered. "Near Warsaw last winter a German shell struck one of our cars and blew it to pieces—there we were under artillery fire all day. And only last week, beyond Kalusz, the whole train was captured by Austrians. But they let us go again.... We're bound for Vilna now with a load of wounded. In two days we'll be back there...."

Tea and cigarettes were forthcoming, with the customary large-hearted Russian hospitality, and we sat around while they told us of the pleasures of a perpetual travelling vacation—for all the world like their ancestors, the nomadic Russian tribes.

Tarnopol station was a place of vast confusion. From a long military train poured running soldiers with tin teapots to the kipiatok, hurtling a column of infantry that was marching across to another train. Officers shouted and cursed, beating with the fiat of their swords. Engines whistled hysterically, bugles blared—calling the men back to their cars. Some hesitated and stopped, undecided whether to go forward or back; others ran faster. Around the hotwater tanks was a boiling, yetting mob. Clouds of steam rose from the pouring faucets.... Hundreds of peasant refugees—Poles, Moldavians, and Hungarians—squatted along the platform waiting stolid and bewildered among their bundles and rolls of bedding; for as they retreated the Russians were clearing the country of every living thing and destroying houses and crops.... The station-master waved futile hands in the centre of a bawling crowd of officers and civilians, all flourishing passes and demanding when their various trains departed....

An armed sentry at the door tried to stop us, but we pushed by. He made a half-motion with his rifle, took a step and paused irresolutely, bellowing something about passes—and we went on. A hundred spies could have entered Tarnopol....

"Na Stap!" we cried to the cabby: "To the Staff!" Along the railroad yards on each side were mountains of sacks and boxes higher than the houses. Tarnopol was a city of solid Polish architecture, with occasional big modern German buildings, and sudden vistas of narrow busy streets lined with hundreds of shops, all painted with signs picturing the goods sold within; streets swarming with Jews in long black coats and curly brimmed black hats. Here they looked better off and less servile than in Novo Sielitz. As everywhere in Galicia and Poland, there was a smell of combined "kosher," boot-leather, and what we call "Polak"; it filled the air, tainted the food we ate, and impregnated our very bed-clothes.

Half-way down the street we met a column of soldiers marching four abreast toward the railway station, bound for the front. Less than a third had rifles.

They came tramping along with the heavy, rolling pace of booted peasants, heads up, arms swinging—bearded giants of men with dull, brick-red hands and faces, dirty-brown belted blouses, blanket-rolls over their shoulders, intrenching-tools at their belts, and great wooden spoons stuck in their boot-tops. The earth shook under their tread. Row after row of strong, blank, incurious faces set westward toward unknown battles, for reasons incomprehensible to them. And as they marched, they sang—a plain chant as simple and tremendous as a Hebrew psalm. A lieutenant at the head of the column sang one bar, the first sergeant took him up—and then like a dammed-up river burst the deep easy voice of three thousand men, flung out from great chests in a rising sudden swell of sound, like organs thundering:

"For the last time I walk with you my friends—

For the last time!

And to-morrow, early in the morning, Will weep my mother and my brethren, For I am going away to the war! And also will weep my sweetheart, Whom I have loved for many, many years....

She whom I hoped one day to go with to the church....

I swear that I will love her until I die!"

They passed, and the roaring slow chorus rose and fell crashing fainter and fainter. Now we rode between interminable hospitals, where haggard, whit-edraped figures leaned listlessly from the windows, bleached yellow from long confinement. Soldiers crowded the streets—wounded men on crutches, old Landwehr veterans, regulars, and boys who couldn't have been more than seventeen. There were three soldiers to every civilian; though that may have been partly due to the fact that many Jews had been "expelled" when the Russians entered the town—a dark and bloody mystery that. On each corner stood an armed sentry, scrutinizing the passers-by with the menacing look of a suspicious peasant. As we drove by in our Stetson hats, knickerbockers and puttees—never before seen in that country of universal boots—they stared open-mouthed. You could read on their faces the painfully born doubt about us—but by that time we were blocks away.

"Stow!" growled the guard before Staff headquarters, lowering his bayonet. "Stop! Shto takoi!"

We wanted an officer who could speak French or German.

"Are you Niemetski?" he asked, using the old peasant word for Germans—meaning "dumb," for the first Germans in Russia couldn't speak the language.

"We are Americans." Other soldiers gathered to listen.

"Amerikanska!" said one man with a cunning smile. "If you are Americans, tell me what language the Americans speak."

"They speak Angliishi."

At this they all looked inquiringly at the learned soldier, who nodded. An officer appeared, looked us up and down very severely, and asked us in German who we were and what we were doing. We explained. He scratched his head, shrugged his shoulders, and disappeared. Another, a huge bearded man, bustled out now and tried us with Russian, Polish, and broken French. It was evidently a poser for him, too, for he walked vaguely up and down, pulling at his beard. Finally he despatched several orderlies in different directions, and motioned us to follow him. We entered a large room that had evidently been a theatre, for there was a stage at one end hung with a gaudily painted curtain. About thirty men in undress uniform bent over desks, laboriously writing out by hand the interminable documents of bureaucratic routine. One was cautiously experimenting with a new invention, the typewriter, which evidently none of them had ever seen before, and which caused everybody great amusement.

A young officer came out of an inside room, and began to fire stern questions in rapid French. Who were we? What were we doing here? How did we come? We told our story.

"Through Bucovina and Galicia!" he cried in astonishment. "But no civilians are permitted to enter Bucovina and Galicia!"

We produced our passes.

"You are correspondents? But don't you know that no correspondents can come to Tarnopol?"

We pointed out that in fact we were there. He seemed at a loss.

"What is your business?" said he uncertainly.

I told him that we wanted to visit the front of the Ninth Army, and to find out about certain American citizens in Galicia—at the request of the American minister in Bucharest. He ran his eye down the list of names.

"Bah! Jews!" he remarked disgustingly. "Why does your country admit Jews to citizenship? Or, if it does, why doesn't it keep them at home? Where do you want to go—Strij? Kalusz? That is not possible!"

"Ah," I said, "then Strij and Kalusz are on the first line now?"

He grinned. "No. The second line—the German second line!"

We were astounded by the rapidity of the German advance.

"It is only a question of time," he went on indifferently. "They will soon be here." And suddenly he sprang to attention. "The general!"

The thirty clerks leaped to their feet with one bound.

"Good day, my children," said a pleasant voice.

"Good day to your generalship!" shouted the clerks in unison—and sat down again to their work.

General Lichisky was a man under middle age, with a keen, smiling face. He saluted us and cordially shook hands.

"So you wish to go to the front?" he said, when the officer had explained. "I don't understand how you managed to get here—for correspondents have not been allowed in Tarnopol at all. However, your papers are perfectly satisfactory. But I cannot permit you to visit the first line; the Grand Duke has issued an order absolutely forbidding it. You had better go to Lvov—Lemberg—and see what can be done through Prince Bobrinski, governor-general of Galicia.... I will give you passes. In the meanwhile, you may stay here as long as your business requires it...."

He detailed a young subofficer who spoke English to look after us, and ordered that we should be lodged at the hotel reserved for officers of the Staff, and dine at the mess.

We wandered about the town. Tarnopol was full of troops—regiments returning from the front for a rest, others going out, still more, fresh troops, arriving from Russia with uniforms yet unsoiled by battle; mighty singing choruses shocked and smashed against each other in a ceaseless surge of big voices. Few of the men had arms. Long wagon-trains loaded with immense quantities of flour, meat, and canned food filed toward the west—but we saw no ammunition.

A young lieutenant told us things. He had been through the Masurian Lakes disaster, and later in the Carpathians.

"Even before the retreat," he said, "we didn't have half enough rifles or ammunition. My company, for example, was stationed in two trenches—a front trench and a reserve trench. A third of my men were in the first trench, and they had rifles. All the rest had no rifles—their duty was to go forward, one by one, and pick up the rifles of those who were killed...."

As we walked along, the guards on the corners gathered and looked at us, whispering, until they made up their minds that we were German spies—

A SOLDIER ON DUTY GAPED FOR SEVERAL MINUTES AT OUR PUTTEES. (TARNOPOL.) then they arrested us and took us to the Prefecture. There no one knew what to do with us, so we were solemnly marched to the Staff, where our friend the French-speaking officer set us free again, loading our captors with abuse. The poor guards slunk away in great bewilderment; their orders were to arrest suspicious-looking persons, and when they did so, they were threatened with the knout. At regular intervals all day we were arrested by new sets of soldiers, and the same farce gone through.

"Beasts!" shouted the officer, shaking his fist at the poor, puzzled soldiers. "Fools! I'll have you punished!"

We suggested mildly that he might give us a pass which we could show to people when they stopped us, but he said that he had no authority....

Late in the afternoon we stood near the barracks, watching a long column of sullen Austrian prisoners marching in between their guards. A soldier on duty gaped for several minutes at our puttees, let his eyes slowly travel up our costumes, and finally arrested us, and took us up to a major in spectacles who stood on the corner.

He questioned us in German, and I answered. He peered suspiciously over his glasses.

"Where are your passports?"

I said that we had left them at the hotel.

"I think I shall take you to the Staff," said he.

"We have already been to the Staff," said I.

"Hum!" he meditated. "Then to the Police."

"What is the use of that? We've already been to the Police."

"Hum!" It was puzzling, so he changed the subject. "You are correspondents? In what countries have you been?"

"We have just come from Serbia."

"And how is it in Serbia?"

I said that the sickness was terrible there.

"Sickness!" said he. "What sickness?" He had never heard of the typhus. "Really!" he said indifferently. "Tell me; will Italy enter the war, do you think?"

"Italy has already been in the war for six weeks."

"You don't say!" he yawned. "Well, gentlemen, I must leave you. Very happy to have made your acquaintance—sehr angenehm... ." and he bowed and walked away.

No one knew when the train for Lemberg left; our officer telephoned to the quartermaster, who called up the chief of transport, who in turn asked the chief of the railway administration. The answer was that everything was so mixed up that there was no certainty—it might leave in five minutes and it might leave to-morrow morning. So we plunged again into the frightful melee at the station, stacked our bags against the wall, and sat down to wait. Long files of stretchers bore groaning wounded to hospitaltrains, running soldiers jostled each other, officers bawled hoarsely, sweating conductors made despairing gestures about their trains blocked interminably along the tracks. A fat colonel confronted the harassed station-master, pointing to his regiment drawn up along the freight platform as far as the eye could reach.

"Where the devil is my train?" he shouted. The station-master shrugged.

There were cavalry officers in green trousers, with broad sabres; subalterns of the automobile and aeroplane corps who carried blunt, ivory-handled daggers in place of swords; Cossack atamans from Ural and Kuban with pointed, turned-up boots, long caftans open in front and laced at the waist, tall fur hats barred on top with gold and red, belts bossed with precious metals and silver-mounted yataghans; generals of various degrees of generality. There were club-footed officers, near-sighted officers who couldn't see to read, one-armed and epileptic officers. Minor officials of the postal service and the railway went by dressed like field-m Marshals and carrying swords. Almost every one wore a uniform with gold or silver shoulder-straps; their number and variety were bewildering. Scarcely an officer whose breast was not decorated with the gold and silver badges of the Polytechnic or the Engineering School, the bright ribbons of the Orders of Vladimir, St. George, or St. Michael; gold-hilted honor swords were frequent. And every one incessantly saluted every one else....

Seven hours later we boarded the train for Lemberg, and got into a compartment with two shabby, middle-aged lieutenants who were typical of nine-tenths of the minor Russian bureaucrats. We began talking ragged German, and I asked them about the suppression of vodka.

"Vodka!" said one. "You may be sure they didn't suppress the vodka without making up the money lost in some other way. It is all very well for war-time—you know, the Revolution in 1905 was due entirely to the peasants' getting drunk on vodka—but after the war we shall have vodka again. Everybody wants vodka. They cannot stop it."

His companion asked if there were compulsory military service in America. I said no.

"Like England," he nodded. "That is all very well for you, but in Russia it wouldn't do at all. The peasants wouldn't fight."

"But I thought the people were very enthusiastic about the war?"

"Pooh!" he answered contemptuously. "The Russian peasant is a very silly person. He cannot read or write. If you asked him to volunteer, he would say that he was very comfortable where he was, and didn't care to be killed. But when you order him to go, he goes!"

I wanted to know whether there was any organized opposition to the war. The first man nodded.

"Fifteen members of the Duma—they can't execute Duma members—are in prison for sending revolutionary propaganda to the army. The men who circulated it in the ranks have all been shot. They were mostly Jews...."

It took fourteen hours to go forty-five miles. We halted hours on switches to let military trains go by, and long white strings of silent cars that smelled of iodoform. Again miles and miles of wheat-fields yellowing richly—a wonderful harvest here. The country was alive with soldiers. They thronged every station; half-armed regiments slouched along the platform, waiting for their trains; trains of cavalry and their horses, trains of flat cars piled high with supplies, preceded and followed us, or passed going in the other direction. Everywhere utter disorganization—a battalion side-tracked all day without food, and farther on huge dining sheds where thousands of meals were spoiling, because the men didn't come. Engines whistled impatiently for a clear track.... One had an impression of vast forces hurled carelessly here and there, of indifference on a grand scale, of gigantic waste.

How different from the faultless German machine I saw at work in northern France four months after the occupation! There, too, was a problem of transporting millions of men, of hurrying them from one point to another, of carrying arms, ammunition, food, and clothing for them. But although northern France is covered with railroads and Galicia is not, the Germans had built new four-track lines plunging across country and cutting through cities, over bridges made of steel and concrete, erected in eighteen days. In German France trains were never late....

LEMBERG BEFORE THE GERMANS CAME
THE immense station at Lemberg—or

Lvov in Polish—was choked with troops running and calling, with soldiers asleep on the filthy floor, with stupefied refugees wandering vaguely about. No one questioned or stopped us, though Lemberg was one of the forbidden places. We drove through the ancient and royal Polish city, between the gloomy walls of great stone buildings like Roman and Florentine palaces—once the seats of the world's proudest nobility. In little squares among the mediaeval twisted streets were Gothic churches of the great period—high, thin roofs, spires of delicate stone tracery, and rich rose-windows. Immense modern German buildings bulked across the noble sky-line, and there were the brilliant shops, restaurants and cafes, wide green squares of a big city. Shabby Jewish quarters encroached on the smart streets, littered with filth and populous with noisy Hebrews, but here their houses and shops were wider, they laughed more, walked more like free people than in the other places we had been. Soldiers—always soldiers—shuffling Jews, and quick, gesticulating Poles—the ugliest race in the world—thronged the sidewalks. Everywhere were wounded men in every stage of convalescence. Whole streets of houses had been turned into temporary hospitals. Never in any country during the war have I seen such vast numbers of wounded as behind the Russian front.

The Hotel Imperial was an old palace. Our room measured twenty-five feet by thirty, fourteen feet high, and the outside walls were nine feet thick. We breakfasted, lost in the wastes of this vast apartment; and then, because our pass read, "The bearers must report immediately to the Chancellery of the governor-general of Galicia," we took our way to the ancient palace of the Polish kings, where the local Russian bureaucracy was functioning with all its clumsy ineffectualness.

A surging crowd of refugees and civilians of all sorts beat about the clerk's desk in the anteroom. Finally he took our pass, read it attentively two or three times, turned it upside down, and handed it back with a shrug of the shoulders. He paid no further attention to us. So we forced our way past several sentries into an inner office, where an officer sat writing at a desk. He looked at the pass and smiled sweetly.

"Ya nisnayo," said he. "I know nothing about it."

We asked for some one who could speak French or German, and he went to find one. Three-quarters of an hour later he returned with an oldish captain who spoke some German. We explained that General Lichisky had ordered us to report to the Chancellery, and that we wanted to go to the front.

"I will show you. This way." He motioned us down a passage. We walked on for some time, and suddenly looking around, missed him. We never saw him again.

Immediately ahead was a door marked "Staff of the Governor-General," which we entered, telling the orderly that we wanted to speak to some one who understood French or German. A genial colonel promptly appeared, shaking hands and introducing himself: "Piotr Stefanovitch Verchovsky, & votre service." We told our tale.

"Please wait a few minutes, gentlemen," said he, "and I will arrange your affair."

He took our pass and disappeared. Four hours later an orderly came into the room and handed me the pass, shrugging his shoulders.

"Where is Colonel Verchovsky?" we demanded.

"Ne ponimayo I" he muttered. "I don't understand!"

I went to the door and sent the orderly to find the colonel; and in a few minutes he appeared, polite as ever, but greatly surprised to see us still there.

"Your pass distinctly says that you must report to the Chancellery," he explained, "but I have tried in vain to find the proper department. The truth is that we are in great confusion here on account of this morning's news. I advise you to go to Prince Bobrinski's personal headquarters, and ask to speak with his aide-de-camp, Prince Troubetskoi.... But don't say I sent you."

There were four sets of suspicious sentries to pass on our way to the governor's. We sent in our cards, and were immediately ushered into a room full of smartly dressed officers smoking, laughing and talking, and reading newspapers. One dashing boy in a hussar uniform, surrounded by a gay circle, was telling in French a story about himself and a Polish countess whom he had met at Nice.... A gentlefaced, bearded pope of the Russian church, in a long, black-silk soutane, with a huge silver crucifix dangling from a silver neck-chain, paced up and down arm in arm with a bull-necked colonel covered with decorations.... Nothing seemed farther from this easy, pleasant-mannered company than war.

A great handsome youth with shining teeth under a heavy mustache came forward, holding out his hand.

"I'm Troubetskoi," said he in English. "How on earth did you manage to get here? It is impossible for correspondents to enter Lemberg!"

We produced quantities of passes signed by generals and their chiefs of staff.

"Americans!" he sighed, biting his lips to repress a grin. "Americans! What's the use of regulations when Americans are about? I don't understand how you found out I was here, or why you came to me.

We murmured something about having met Troubetskoi the sculptor, in New York.

"Ah yes," said he. "That is the international one. He does not speak Russian, I believe.... But now you are here, what can I do for you?"

"We want to go to the front." Here he shook his head doubtfully. "At least we thought the governor-general might let us visit Przemyśl"

"I'm sure he would," grinned the prince, "but for the regrettable news of this morning. The Austrians entered Przemyśl at eight o'clock!"

We had not dreamed that it would fall so soon. "Do you think they will get to Lemberg?"

"Very probably," he answered in an uninterested tone. "Neither are now of any strategic value. We are rectifying our line." Then changing the subject, he said that he would see the governor-general himself and ask what could be done for us. Would we come in the morning?

The pope, who had been listening, now asked in very good English, what part of America we were from.

"I have been in America for sixteen years," he said, smiling. "For eight years I was priest of the Greek church in Yonkers, New York. I came back for the war to help all I could.... Now I only wait for peace to go back yonder."

As we emerged on the street, a column of gigantic soldiers, four deep, rounded the corner with their tin buckets swinging, tramping to their kitchens for dinner. Just in front of the palace the front rank burst into song, and with a roar the following ranks joined in:

"I remember when I was a young girl, During the army manoeuvres p is

To my village came a young officer
With soldiers, and he said to me,
'Give me some water to drink.'
When he finished drinking, he stooped from his horse
And kissed me.

Long stood I looking after him as he went away,

And all night I could not sleep—
All night he was in my dreams....
Many years after, when I was a widow ow

And had married off my four daughters,

To my village came an old general;
And he was broken and wounded with many wounds.

He groaned. When I looked at him my heart beat fast—

It was the same young officer, I could not mistake him:

Brave as ever—the same voice,
Brave as ever—the same eyes,
But many white hairs in his mustache.

And so, as many years ago, this night
I cannot sleep,

And all night in my dreams I see him.
..."

Now through all the streets poured rivers of soldiers singing. We could see their hats flowing along the end of the avenue, over the top of a little rise. Grand choruses met, clashing like cross-seas in the echoing hollows between tall buildings—the city hummed with deep melody. This was the inexhaustible strength of Russia, the powerful blood of her veins spilled carelessly from her bottomless fountains of manhood, wasted, lavished. The paradox of a beaten army which gathers strength, a retreating host whose very withdrawal is fatal to the conquerors.

Our Russian money was running low, so in the morning we went out to change our English gold. But no one wanted English gold. Everybody asked the same question, in a low voice, peering around to see that no soldiers were within hearing: "Have you any Austrian money?" For already it was rumored in the city that the Austrians were coming again.

165

We kept our appointment with Troubetskoi, who led us through the ancient throne-room of the palace to the office of the governor-general's assistant, a pleasant-mannered officer whose coat blazed with decorations.

"Prince Troubetskoi and I have really done our best for you," he said with a friendly smile. "But the governor regrets that he cannot give you permission to visit the front. For that you must apply to the military authorities—he is simply a civil official, you know.... However, I haven't a doubt that they will allow you to go. And in that case, return here and we shall be most happy to take care of you."

We asked where the permission was to be had.

"There are two ways. Either you may proceed to Petrograd, and arrange matters with his Highness the Grand Duke Nicolai Nicolaievitch through your ambassadors, or go to Cholm in Poland, which is the headquarters of General Ivanov, commander-in-chief of the southwestern front. Both Prince Troubetskoi and I think you will be more successful if you make application to General Ivanov, and his Excellency the governor-general is of the same opinion. I will give you passes which will carry you to Cholm."

At midnight we left the hotel to catch the train for Cholm, and there being no cabs in sight, an officer bound for the station called out in French that he would be happy if we would share his. His oval, half-Semitic face might have been copied from an Assyrian wall-painting—he said he was a Georgian from the Caucasus.

"The Georgian regiments have been ordered here from the Turkish front, because of their heroic conduct. The Grand Duke has done right; we Georgians are by far the bravest soldiers in the army," said he.

"Will the Austrians take Lemberg?" asked Robinson.

"Oh yes," he answered complacently: "We expect them every day now. But it doesn't matter, you know. Next winter we'll come back — or the winter after."

"AN OPTIMISTIC PILGRIMAGE CHOLM is not a hundred miles in an air-line from Lemberg, but there is no direct railroad between them; one must make a wide devour into Russia and back through Poland, more than three hundred miles.

We were in a compartment for four, the other two being a silent young lieutenant who lay in his berth with his boots on, smoking, and a crotchety old general invalided home. The general tried to shut tight both door and window—for the Russians share with other Continental peoples a morbid fear of fresh air. Followed a dramatic battle lasting all night, in which stalwart American manhood defied the liveried minions of the Tzar to close that window—but was finally subdued at dawn by the railroad police....

White Russia. For hours we rode through an untouched wilderness of birch and pine without seeing a house or a human being, the engine's whistle alone breaking the echoing silence of the woods. Sometimes a gap in the forest gave glimpses of wide yellow plains, where black tree-stumps stood among the wheat. Wretched villages huddled around the government vodka shop—now closed—wooden huts roofed with neglected thatch, which straggled miserably beside muddy, rutted spaces populous with rooting pigs and immense flocks of geese....

Great-shouldered women were working in the fields, mowing with broad strokes rhythmically abreast—probably some Female Mowers' Guild from a distant country. There were plenty of young, strong tnujiks everywhere. They swung axes amid crashing-down trees, drove singing along the roads, and swarmed over the joists and timbers of giant miles of sheds that covered the mountainous heaps of army supplies. Yet not for an instant could we forget the war. The towns were all full of shouting soldiers; train after train whirled westward, packed with them. And as we paused on side-tracks, past glided an endless procession of white sanitary cars with pale, agonized faces peering from the windows under their bandages. Every village had its military hospital....

We changed trains at Rovno, where there was a wait of nine hours. There we ran into Miroshnikov, the English-speaking subofficer who had looked after us in Tarnopol, now bound north on official business.

"Let's walk around," he proposed. "I want to show you a typical Jewish town of the Pale."

As we went along, I asked the meaning of the red, white, and blue cord that edged his shoulderstraps.

"That means I am a volunteer—exempt from compulsory service. The Russian word for 'volunteer,'" he answered the question with a grin, "is 'Volnoopredeliyayouslchemusia.'"

We gave up all hopes of learning the language....

I can never forget Rovno, the Jewish town of the Pale of Settlement. It was Russian in its shabby largeness, wide streets half paved with cobbles, dilapidated sidewalks, rambling wooden houses ornamented with scroll-saw trimmings painted bright green, and the swarming uniforms of its minor officialdom. Tiny-wheeled cabs abounded, with their heavy Russian yoke, driven by hairy degenerates who wore tattered velvet robes and bell-top hats of outrageous shape. But all the rest was Jewish.... The street was heaped with evil-smelling rubbish, amid slimy puddles splashed up by every passing conveyance. Clouds of bloated flies buzzed about. On both sides a multitude of little shops strangled each other, and their glaring signs, daubed with portraits of the articles for sale, made a crazy-quilt up and down as far as one could see. The greasy proprietors stood in their reeking doorways, each one bawling to us to buy from him, and not from his cheating competitor across the way. Too many shops, too many cab-drivers, barbers, tailors, herded into this narrow world where alone Jews are allowed to live in Russia; and periodically augmented with the miserable throngs cleared out from the forbidden cities, where they have bribed the police to stay. In the Pale a Jew gasps for breath indeed.

How different these were from even the poorest, meanest Jews in Galician cities. Here they were a pale, stooping, inbred race, refined to the point of idiocy. Cringing men with their "sacred fringes" showing under their long coats—it was at Rovno that we first noticed the little peaked caps worn by Polish Jews—faintly bearded boys with unhealthy faces, girls prematurely aged with bitter work and eternal humiliation, grown women wrinkled and bent, in wigs and slovenly mother hubbards. People who smiled deprecatingly and hatefully when you looked at them, who stepped into the street to let Gentiles pass. And in the very centre of it all, a Russian church with blue incense pouring out the open door, a glitter of gold, jewels, and candle-lighted ikons within, priests in stoles heavy with woven gold threads, atremble with slow, noble chanting.

For a thousand years the Russians and their Church have done their best to exterminate the Jews and their religion. With what success? Here in Rovno were thousands of Jews shut in an impregnable world of their own, scrupulously observing a religion incessantly purified, practising their own customs, speaking their own language, with two codes of morals—one for each other and the other for the Gentiles. Persecution has only engendered a poison and a running sore in the body of the Russian people. It is true what Miroshnikov said, as we drank kvas in a little Jewish bar—that all Jews were traitors to Russia. Of course they are.

An officer whom we had met on the train came in. He sniffed the air, bowed to us, and staring malevolently at the frightened girls who served, said distinctly: "The dirty Jews! I detest them!" and walked out.

We were around Rovno station almost all day long, but it was not until evening that the police decided to arrest us. Among others we appealed to a pompous colonel, named Bolatov, whom we had encountered several times in the course of our travels. He was covered with high decorations, carried a gold honor sword, and had padding in his chest and dye on his ferocious mustache. We never could discover what he did on his leisurely peregrinations around the country. Miroshnikov told him that Robinson was a celebrated artist.

"We shall see!" said Bolatov cunningly. He approached Robinson. "If you are an artist," said he, "please draw my portrait."

He struck a martial attitude under the arc-light, chest expanded, hand on sword-hilt, and mustache twisted up, while Robinson drew for his life. The portrait was an outrageous flattery. Colonel Bolatov glanced at it with perfect satisfaction. He waved to the police.

"Release these gentlemen," he ordered loftily. "They are well-known journalists.... Would you mind signing this sketch?"

That night we slept on the benches of a trooptransport car; changed and waited seven hours at Kovel, and boarded a train bound eventually for Cholm, though no one knew when it would get there. All afternoon we crawled slowly westward through the great Polish plain—vast wheat-fields edged with a foam of red poppies, breaking like a yellow sea against cloudy promontories of trees, and archipelagoes of cheerful thatched villages. Half smothered in mighty blooming locusts were wooden stations where hospitable samovars steamed, and slow-moving, heavyfaced peasants stared motionless at the train—the men in long gray coats of coarse wool, the women gay with bright-colored skirts and kerchiefs. And late in the day, when the low sun inundated the flat world with rich mellow light, and all the red, green, and yellow glowed vividly luminous, we whistled through a sandy pine wood, and saw before us the tree-covered hill of Cholm, with its cluster of shining Greek cupolas floating like golden bubbles above the green foliage.

A new-found but already intimate friend named Captain Martinev was criticising the army with true Russian candor.

"—horrible waste," said he. "Let me tell you a story. In October I was with my regiment in Tilsit when the German drive on Warsaw began, and we received urgent orders to hurry to Poland. Well, from Tilsit to the nearest railroad station, Mittau, is a hundred versts. We did it in three days forced marches, arriving in bad shape. Something had gone wrong—we had to wait twenty-four hours on the platform, without sleep, for it was very cold. By train we travelled two days to Warsaw, almost starving; no one had made arrangements for feeding us. When we arrived Lodz had already fallen. We got in at night and were marched across the city to another train bound for Teresa, where they were fighting. A little way out the tracks had been smashed by a shell; we detrained in the rain at two o'clock in the morning, and marched five hours to Teresa.

"At eight o'clock we reached the headquarters of the division commanded by General M., who made such frightful mistakes in Manchuria. Our men's feet were in terrible condition; they had had practically no sleep for three nights, and hardly any food at all for two days.... Half an hour after we had thrown ourselves down exhausted in the rain, the general came out with his chief of staff.

"How many men have I here?" he asked surlily.

"Eight thousand."

"Good. Send them to relieve the trenches."

"Our colonel protested. 'But my men cannot go into the trenches. They must have rest and food. For five days'

"Never mind!" snapped the general. 'I don't want your opinion. March!'

"The general went back to bed. We coaxed, pleaded, threatened, flogged—it was terrible to hear them beg for food and sleep—and the column staggered off to the forward trenches....

"We went in at ten in the morning and stood particularly heavy fire all day—so heavy that the cook-wagons couldn't reach us until midnight, so there was nothing to eat. The Germans attacked twice in the night, so there was no sleep. Next morning heavy artillery bombarded us. The men reeled as if they were drunk, forgot to take any precautions, and went to sleep while they were shooting. The officers, with blazing eyes, muttering things like men walking in their sleep, went up and down beating the soldiers with the fiat of their swords. ... I forgot what I was doing, and so did everybody, I think; indeed, I can't remember what followed at all—but we were in there for four days and four nights. Once a night the cook-wagons brought soup and bread. At least three times a night the Germans attacked at the point of the bayonet. We retired from trench to trench, turning like beasts at bay—though we were all out of our heads....

"Finally on the fifth morning they relieved us. Out of eight thousand men two thousand came back, and twelve hundred of those went to the hospital.

"But the amusing thing about it was that all the time we were being butchered out there, there were six fresh regiments held in reserve two miles away! What on earth do you suppose General M was thinking of?" ARREST A LA RUSSE

"/HOLM!" said Martinev, nodding at the win_V_4 dow: "Next station." Somewhere among those crowded roofs and spires was the headquarters of General Ivanov, commander-in-chief of all the southwestern Russian armies, next in power to the Grand Duke Nicolai Nicolaievitch himself. At last here was a man with authority to let us visit the front. As we rattled in our cab through the twilight streets of Cholm, Robinson and I had a violent argument about the kind of battle we wanted to see; Robinson hankered for an infantry charge, and I stuck out for a ride with raiding Cosacks.

The sentry at Staff headquarters said that every one had gone for the night.

"Loutche gostinnitza!" we told the driver. Mechanically we looked for the Hotel Bristol, which is to be found in every city, town, and village of the Continent of Europe—but it had suffered the common decline of Hotel Bristols. The best gostinnitza turned out to be a three-story, lath-and-plaster structure half-way down a steep street in the crowded Jewish quarter, with a sign in Russian: "English Hotel." Of course, no one spoke English there—no English-speaking guest had ever visited the place. But a black-mustached little Pole, who bounced perspiring to answer the "Nomernoi!" of impatient guests, knew two phrases of French: "Trhs jolie" and "tout it suite"; and the Hashein or house-master—a Jew of course—spoke Yiddish.

As we were dressing next morning appeared an officer with a shaven head, and asked us politely to accompany him to the Staff. No less than four persons, he said, had heard us speak German and reported the presence of spies at Cholm. We were ushered into a room where, at a small table, sat a pleasant-faced man who smilingly shook hands and spoke French. We gave him the passes and a card of introduction from Prince Troubetskoi.

"The governor-general of Galicia advised us to come here and ask General Ivanov for permission to go to the front.

"

He nodded genially. "Very good. But we must first telegraph the Grand Duke—a mere formality, you know. We'll have an answer in two or three hours at the most. In the meanwhile, please return to your hotel and wait there."

Our room was on the third floor, up under the roof, with a sloping ceiling and two dormer windows overlooking the naked, filthy dooryard of a Jewish house. Beyond were shabby, patched tin roofs of the huddled Jewish town, and rising over them the heavily wooded hill, crowned with the towers and golden domes of the monastery. A cobbled street on the right led up the hill to the gates of the monastery park, between wretched huts and tall tenements swarming with Jews. To the left the view soared over housetops to wide-flung plains that stretched forever north—patches of deep woods, fields, villages, and nearby, the railroad yards alive with shuttling trains.

We waited all day, but no one came. Before we were up next morning the bald-headed officer entered, bowing.

"The Grand Duke has not yet answered," he said evasively; "but doubtless he will in the course of the day—or maybe to-morrow."

"Maybe to-morrow!" we cried together. "I thought it was a matter of two or three hours!"

He looked everywhere but at us. "His Highness is very busy"

"Can't his Highness spare a few minutes from planning retreats to attend to our case?"

"Have patience, gentlemen," said the officer hastily and uncomfortably. "It is only a matter of an hour or so now. I promise you that there will be no delay. ... And now I am ordered to ask you to give me all your papers—of whatever nature."

Were we suspected of being spies? He laughed uneasily and answered no, as he made out a receipt.

"And now," said he, "I shall have to demand your word of honor not to leave the hotel until the answer comes."

"Are we under arrest?"

"Oh dear, no. You are perfectly free. But this is an important military post, you understand—" Muttering vaguely, he made off as fast as he could, to avoid answering any more questions.

Fifteen minutes later the Hashein walked unceremoniously into our room with three Cossacks, big fellows in tall fur hats, pointed boots, long caftans open at the chest; in each belt a silver-worked long dagger hung slantwise in front, and a long, silverhilted Cossack sword at the side. They stared at us with expressionless faces.

"What do they want?" I asked in German.

The Hashein smiled conciliatingly. "Only to look at the gentlemen...."

A little later when I went down-stairs one of the Cossacks was pacing up and down before our door. He drew aside to let me pass, but leaned over the stair-rail, and shouted something in Russian; another, standing in the hall below, came forward; and from the street-door I saw a third peering up.

We wrote an indignant note to General Ivanov, protesting against the Russian conception of "word of honor," and demanding a reason for such treatment. The colonel came at midnight and said that the Cossacks would immediately be withdrawn, with the general's apologies. (Next morning they had been withdrawn—to the bottom of the stairs, where they glowered at us suspiciously.) As for our detention, the colonel explained that that was all a very grave matter. We had entered the zone of military operations without the proper passes.

"How were we to know which passes were proper? They were signed by generals, and honored by Prince Bobrinski at Lemberg. What have we done that's wrong?"

"For one thing," said he, "you have come to Cholm, which is forbidden to correspondents. Secondly, you have discovered that Cholm is General Ivanov's headquarters, and that is a military secret."

"But the governor's adjutant"

"I realize," he interrupted, "that some of our officials have been indiscreet. There is a great scandal about this—all the officers who sent you along have been—!" He made a suggestive movement with his hand. "But that doesn't justify you." And he escaped under a shower of argument.

Saturday morning our friend the shaven lieutenant appeared, looking gloomier than ever.

"I have, gentlemen, to announce to you some very disagreeable news," he began formally. "The Grand Duke has answered our telegram. He says: 'Keep the prisoners under strict guard.'"

"But what about our going to the front?"

"That is all he replied." He hurried on. "So unfortunately you will be compelled to keep to this room until further orders. The guards at the door will attend to your wants."

"Look here," said Robinson. "What's the matter with your silly Grand Duke?"

"Oh—" interjected the officer, with a shocked face.

"What are you shutting us up for? Does the Grand Duke think we're spies?"

"Well," he returned doubtfully, "you see, there are curious things, inexplicable things among your papers. In the first place, there is a list of names"

We explained impatiently for the hundredth time that those were the names of American citizens reported to be caught by the war in the parts of Bucovina and Galicia held by the Russians, and that the American minister in Bucarest had given us the list to investigate.

The officer looked sympathetic but uncomprehending. "But many of them are Jewish names."

"But they are American citizens."

"Ah!" said he. "Do you mean to say that Jews are American citizens?" We affirmed this extraordinary fact, and he didn't contradict us—but you could see he didn't believe it.

Then he gave his orders. We were not to leave the room under any circumstances.

"Can we walk up and down the hall?"

"I am sorry,"—he shrugged his shoulders.

"This is absurd," I said. "What is the charge against us? I demand that we be allowed to telegraph our ambassadors."

He scratched his head vaguely and went out, muttering that he would ask his chief. Two Cossacks immediately mounted the stairs and began to pace up and down in the little hall outside our door; another one stood on the landing below; a fourth at the front door; and the fifth man mounted a shed in the yard of the Jewish house, three stories sheer drop below, and fixed his stolid gaze upon our window.

After consultation, Robinson and I sat down and composed a diplomatic note to the Russian Government—in English, so as to give them the trouble of translating it—formally notifying all concerned that from this date we refused to pay our hotel bill. Summoning a Cossack, we told him to take it to the Staff.

It was now about noon. Over the wide Polish plain the June sun swam slowly up, beating down on the sloping tin roof immediately over our heads. Inconceivable odors rose from the teeming filth of the Jewish quarter, converging at our window. We stripped, garment by garment, and hung out of the window gasping for air. Word had spread abroad of the illustrious captives in the top floor of the "English Hotel," and the Jewish family that inhabited the house below us swarmed out of the door, and stood gazing up at us; stooped, wrinkled old women with bleary eyes, slatternly, bewigged mothers, little girls; venerable old rabbis with long white beards, middle-aged men, thin spectacled youths, and small boys, all dressed alike in the curious peaked cap, and gabardine-like overcoat. Beyond the yard fence was a silent crowd of townspeople, almost all Jews too, staring at our window in silence. They thought we were captured German spies. The Russians considered all Jews to be traitors—indeed, who wouldn't be a traitor if he were a Jew in Russia? With what deep emotion some of them must have looked at us, who heard all day the far-shaking thunder of the German's delivering guns!

That night the shaven officer returned with permission for us to telegraph our ambassadors, and with General Ivanov's reply to our note: he did not know why the Grand Duke ordered us imprisoned. As for the hotel bill, that would be arranged by the government. When we told this to the Hashein he went dead white.

"If the Russian army pays," he cried, "I shall not then ever be paid!"

Meanwhile the telegrams disappeared into the vast unknown, and for eight days no answer came. For eight days we inhabited that malodorous chamber under the hot tin roof. It measured four strides wide by five across. We had no books except a Russian-French dictionary and the "Jardin de Supplice," which exhausted their charm after the sixth perusal. Along about the fifth day the Hashein discovered somewhere in the town a pack of cards, and we played double-dummy bridge until even now I shriek at the sight of a card. Robinson designed me a town house and a country house to while away the time; he designed luxurious city residences for the Cossacks; he drew their portraits. I wrote verses; elaborated impossible plans of escape; planned a novel. We flirted from the window with the cook of the Jewish house below; we made speeches to the townspeople gathered in the street; we screamed curses to the surrounding air, and sang ribald songs; we walked up and down; we slept, or tried to sleep. And every day we spent a happy hour composing insulting communications to the Tzar, the Duma, the Council of Empire, the Grand Duke, General Ivanov and his Staff—which we forced a Cossack to take to headquarters.

Early in the morning appeared the Hashein—a young Jew with a dark, handsome, expressionless face covered by a silky brown beard—followed by a suspicious Cossack.

"Morgen I!" he would shout at us in broken German, as we stuck our noses out of the bedclothes. "Was wotten sie essen heute?"

"What can we have?" we would invariably reply.

"Spiegdeier—biftek—kartoffdn—schnitzel—brot—butter—chai."

Day after day we took the Russian-French dictionary, and labored with him to change the diet; but he could not read

Russian, and refused to understand it when we pronounced the words. So we alternated between eggs, tough steak, and veal, with always the eternal tea at least six times a day. A samovar operated on the balcony below our window, and from time to time one of us rushed to the door, pushed the Cossack out of the way, leaned over the stairs and bellowed "Hashein!" There was a running and calling of anxious Cossacks, doors opened and guests popped their heads out, and cries came echoing up from below.

"Sktol!"

"Chai!" we bellowed. "Dva chai—skorie I!"

We tried to have eggs for breakfast, but the Hashcin refused. "Eggs for lunch, eggs for dinner, but no eggs for breakfast," he announced calmly: "Eggs for breakfast are very unhealthy."

Once after an hour's labor I made him understand that we wanted bacon with our eggs. He threw up his hands in horror. "Bacon!" said he. "Yes, it can be procured; but only Gentiles eat bacon. I shall not give you bacon." PRISON LIFE IN CHOLM ASOTNIA of Kubanski Cossacks in reserve at Cholm had nothing to do but exercise their horses and stand guard over us. A hundred half-savage giants, dressed in the ancient panoply of that curious Slavic people whose main business is war, and who serve the Tzar in battle from their fifteenth to their sixtieth year; high fur hats, long caftans laced in at the waist and colored dull pink or blue or green, with slanting cartridge pockets on each breast, curved yataghans inlaid with gold and silver, daggers hilted with uncut gems, and boots with sharp toes turned up. At first, guarding prisoners was an amusing novelty to them. By day those who knew us brought their friends to look us over; and at intervals in the night, the ones who hadn't been able to come during the day stamped noisily into the room, lit the lamp, and poked us awake with their scabbards.

They were like overgrown children. Some came on guard nervously clasp- ing their sword-hilts, and backed cautiously out again, so that we should not get behind them. Others were shy and trusting—eager to make friends; for hours they would pore over the French-Russian dictionary, spelling out their life histories. One friendly Cossack, in particular, spent most of his time with Robinson, both painfully boasting about their homes and their children. In that eight days we received the entire sotnia several times. They got their portraits drawn, overhauled our outfit with ceaseless curiosity, felt the material of our clothes, smoked our cigarettes, marvelled at the pictures Robinson drew of the New York sky-line, and argued interminably among themselves as to whether or not we were German spies. None of them had ever been to western Europe before, and they didn't know what to make of it.

The majority were like that—whether we were German or not made no difference to them—but one thin, evil-faced youth with a blond mustache treated us like captives of a hated enemy. When he was on duty he clumped noisily into the room without knocking, helped himself to cigarettes, and took any money he saw lying around. Sometimes when I was reading he jerked the book out of my hand. We remonstrated with Ivan; we told him in plain English to cut it out. He responded insolently in Russian. And this went on for several days.

One day Ivan entered, swaggered insolently to the table and took a handful of cigarettes—and then spat on the floor. "Get out, Ivan!" shouted Robinson. Ivan sneered in Russian. "Get out, or we'll put you out!"

The Cossack had his back to me, and the door was open. I took him suddenly around the waist from the rear, and running him to the head of the stairs, gave him a push. In a clatter of scimitars and daggers he rolled down a long flight of stairs; and rising at the bottom drew his weapons with a roar of rage and came charging up. Robinson and I held the door. Ivan thrust his sabre through the crack and waved it around, bellowing wrathfully. But the Cossacks on the landing simply leaned against the wall and shouted with laughter; so finally Ivan went away, and he never came back again....

Three times a day the Cossacks rode their horses down the steep street, around the hotel and out the street to the left, and as they rode they sang a great, lifting, roaring chant, like a stern old hymn. We always leaned from the window as they passed, and when they came under us every man looked up and grinned, and raised his hand to salute—all except Ivan, who made a ferocious grimace and shook his fist at us; whereat we leaned down and shook our fists at him.

Sometimes in the breathless evening, when the Cossack in the yard below had got tired of watching and slipped off for a drink, we would climb out of our window onto the steep peaked roof and look down on the tin roofs and teeming overcrowded streets of the town. Southward on the hill were the two ancient spires of the grand old Catholic church, remnant of the days of glory when John Poniatowski was King of Poland. Down on a dark side street was the squat, unmarked building that held the Jewish synagogue and the heder—the Jewish sacred school—and from this building ascended day and night the whining drone of boys chanting the sacred books, and the deeper voices of ravs and rebbs hotly discussing the intricate questions of the law. The tide of Russia was rising and overflowing this city of old Poland. We could see from our roofs colossal military barracks and institutions—immense buildings with facades a quarter of a mile long, as they are in Petrograd; and eight churches building or completed lifted grotesque onion-shaped towers into the air, colored red and blue, or patterned in gay lozenges. Directly before our window was the Holy Hill. Above a rich mass of green trees six golden bulbs rose from the fantastic towers of the monastery, and at evening and on Sunday deep-toned and tinkly bells galloped and boomed. Morning and night we watched the priests going up and down the street—fanatic-faced men with beards and long curly hair falling upon their shoulders, dressed in gray or black silk coats falling to their feet. And the Jews on the sidewalk stepped submissively out of their way. Now the monastery was a military hospital. Groups of girls in the lovely white head-dress of the Russian Red Cross hurried in and out of the great gates where two soldiers always stood guard; and there was always a silent knot of people peering curiously through the iron fence. Occasionally a wide-open yelling siren could be heard rising and deepening out of the distance, and presently an automobile would rush furiously up the steep street, full of wounded officers. Once it was a big open machine, in which the body of a huge man writhed in the grip of four nurses who were trying to hold him down. Where his stomach had been was a raw mass of blood and rags, and he screamed awfully all the way up the hill, until the trees swallowed the automobile and his screams simultaneously.

During the day the uproar of the teeming town obscured all other sound. But at night we could hear, or rather feel, the shocking thunder of the enemy's guns less than twenty miles away.

Immediately under our eyes was enacted every day the drama of Jewish life in Russia. Our Cossack guard paraded superciliously about the yard of the house below, the children making wide de'tours as they passed him, the young girls bringing him glasses of tea and trying to smile at his coarse familiarities, the old people stopping politely to talk with him and casting looks of hate at him behind his back. He strutted about like a lord, he the humblest slave of the Russian military machine; they cringed and curried favor with the member of the dominant race. We noticed that every two or three days all the Jews, young and old, wore upon their breasts a little paper medallion. One morning the Eushein came to our room with one: it was a cheap electrogravure of the Tzar's daughter, the Grand Duchess Tatiana.

"What is that?" I asked him, pointing to it.

He shrugged his shoulders in a bitter kind of way. "It is the Grand Duchess's birthday," he said.

"But I have seen the people wearing it already twice this week."

"Every two or three days," he answered, "is the Grand Duchess's birthday. At least that is what the Cossacks say. The Cossacks make every Jew buy a picture of the Grand Duchess on her birthday and wear it. It costs five roubles. We are only poor Jews, too ignorant to know what day is the Grand Duchess's birthday. But the Cossacks are Russians, and they know."

"What if you refuse to buy it?" I asked.

He drew his finger significantly across his throat and made a gurgling noise.

It was a filthy place, that yard, full of the refuse of two Jewish houses and whatever the hotel guests threw out of their windows. A high board fence separated it from the street, with great wooden gates closed by a strong bar. The door and the lower windows of the house were also protected by heavy wooden shutters fastened from the inside. These were for defense against pogroms. Against the fence a slanting platform of planks had been erected, where all day long innumerable dirty little children climbed up and slid down, shrieking with laughter, or lay on their stomachs with their noses over the fence to watch the Cossacks ride by. Babies wailed and sprawled in the mud of the yard. From the open doors and windows ascended the odors of perpetual "kosher" cooking, the intimate smells of people too overcrowded and too poor to keep clean—the kind you meet on the lower East Side.

But every Friday at noon the house was all of a bustle, as was every Jewish house in the town, preparing for the Sabbath. All the women put on the oldest working clothes; slops were emptied into the yard, and a tin tub of steaming water stood on the door-step, out of which bucketfuls were carried inside, whence came sounds of scrubbing, sweeping, the slap of wet mops, and the rhythmic songs of Jewish women at work. The buckets, now full of dirty water, were poured back in the tin tub, and after its contents had become brown and thick like soup, all the family receptacles were brought—pans, crockery, knives and forks, cups and glasses—and washed there. The fountain was too far away to waste water. And after that the children each filled a bucket from the tub and went in to bathe, while the rest scoured the doorjamb and the window-sills and the two stone steps below the door, swaying in unison to a minor chant.

The linen hanging on the clothes-line was taken in. A feeling of joy and release was abroad; the terrorized gloom of week-days seemed to lift. All the little Jewish shops closed early, and the men came home walking in little friendly knots like people whose work is done. Each put on his best long coat and peaked cap, his most shiny boots, and went out to join the ever-thickening steady stream of sober, blackrobed people that flowed toward the synagogue.

In the house the dirty carpets were rolled up to reveal the white floor, which is always covered except on the Sabbath, and on the days of great religious feasts. And one by one the women, girls, and little children came laughing and chattering out of the purified house in their best clothes, and went out on the street, where all the other women and children were gathered, to gossip together and show off their finery.

From our window we could see a corner of the kitchen, with the wrinkled old dowager of the house superintending the sealing of the oven; could hear the jangling of the keys being put out of sight for the Holy Day, and look full upon the dining-room table with its row of candles lit for Candle Prayer, and the Sabbath loaf covered with its doily, the wine flask, and kiddush cup.

The men came slowly home from synagogue, and up and down the street, in animated conversation, strolled the pale, super-refined young Jewish intellectuals, arguing delicate points of the Law as the dusk came down. The family stood silent, thickclustered, with bowed heads hiding the table, while blessing over the wine was said, and the consecrated loaf cut—the yellow candle-light striking up along their olive skins, and the strange sharp ridges of their Oriental faces.... After supper the children played quietly, stiffly in their Sabbath clothes, and the women gathered in front of the houses; as the darkness grew, from every window of a Jewish house a light beamed, to show the wayfarer that the spirit of God brooded over that roof. And we could look into the windows of a long, bare room on the second story, empty during the week, where the men-folks gathered with great books spread out before them on the table, and sang together deep-toned, Oriental-sounding psalms until late into the night.

On the Sabbath the men went in the morning to the synagogue. It was a day of much visiting between houses in Sabbath clothes; of an interminable dinner that lasted the greater part of the afternoon, with gay songs sung by the whole family to clapping of hands; of dressed-up families, down to the last baby, straggling along the road that led around the base of the Holy Hill toward the open country.... And then night and the unsealing of the oven, the putting down of the carpets, little Yakub repeating his lessons to his teacher in a singsong wail, the opening of the shops, old clothes again, dirt, and terror.

Every day or so a tragic little procession would pass up the street that led to the prison beyond the monastery: two or three Jews in their characteristic long coats and peaked caps, shuffling along with expressionless faces and dejected drooping shoulders, preceded and followed by a great shambling soldier with a bayoneted rifle in the hollow of his arm. Many times we asked the Hashein about these people; but he always professed ignorance. Where were they going? "To Siberia," he would mumble, "or perhaps—" and he would gesture the pulling of a trigger. The Hashein was an extremely prudent person. But sometimes he stood for a long time in our room, looking from Robinson to me and back again, as if there was much to say if only he dared. Finally he shook his head, sighed, and went out past the watchful Cossack, devoutly touching the paper prayer nailed up at the door-jamb.

Toward the end we got no answer to our ultimatums, and the shaven-headed officer came no more; it was such a disagreeable job to answer our arguments! The Cossacks, too, found more entertaining business elsewhere, though they never ceased to salute and shout greetings as they rode past our window; so at last we saw only the Hashein, the Cossack on guard, and the two grinning and shapeless Polish servants—Fred and Annie—whom the Hashein underfed and overworked, as a Russian Jew will a Christian if he gets the chance.

FURTHER ADVENTURES IN CAPTIVITY
ONE day a postman in gaudy uniform, accompanied by several curious friends, came bowing and clicking into the room with a telegram from the American ambassador:

"You have been arrested because you entered the war zone without proper authority. The Foreign Office notifies this embassy that you will be sent to Petrograd."

That was all. Silence settled down again, and the outside world withdrew itself from our ken. One blank, monotonous day succeeded another. We were forgotten.

And then several nights later, there sounded a jingling of spurs and a light rap at our door. Two officers filed solemnly in; one a stout, perspiring little man who introduced himself as Ivanov, quartermaster of the Southwestern Army and cousin of the general, the other a thin, bald-headed epileptic with a withered arm, covered with decorations—Lieutenant Potemkin. His body and face muscles twitching with a sort of St. Vitus's dance, the latter began to talk, and after some time we discovered he was speaking an obscure dialect of English. The drift of his remarks was, that we were free.

"May we return to Bucarest?" "Yes, gentlemen."

"How can we get to the front?"

"What does he say, what does he say?" queried the quartermaster in a squeaking voice. The lieutenant translated, and they both fell to laughing uproariously.

"I should advise you," said the lieutenant, stuttering—he was like a speaking skeleton—"I should advise you to go Petrograd inquiring your ambassador the Grand Duke to petition—yes, there are diplomatical procedures." He nodded his head violently.

Robinson and I discussed the matter; perhaps if we went to Petrograd, we might yet reach the Russian front.

"If you will come quarter-general your effect documentaries are given," continued the lieutenant fluently. We accompanied him then and there, and he returned to us passports, letters, passes, and the doubtful list of Jewish citizens. We demanded a pass to Petrograd, so that we would not be arrested. He said it was not necessary; that no one would arrest us; however, upon our insisting, he made one out. And it was lucky he did, for we were arrested at least twenty times.

Mr. George T. Marye, the American ambassador, was at lunch in the hotel when I got there; a precise little man with glasses and a white mustache.

"Mr. Reed," he said in a dry, quavering voice, "I am very glad to see you in Petrograd. You have given this office a great deal of anxiety—a great deal. Now, Mr. Reed, I do not want to insist upon your misdemeanors, but my best advice is for you to leave Russia immediately by the shortest route."

"Leave Russia!" said I with considerable astonishment: "What for?"

"Why," he answered testily, "it should be perfectly evident. You have been sent here under military guard"

"Not at all," I answered. "We were released and told that we could return to Bucarest."

"Bucarest!" said he incredulously, "but I am informed by the Foreign Office that you were to be sent here under arrest, and expelled from Russia. If this is not so, I should advise you to leave the country as fast as possible."

"But what have I done?"

"The despatches which I have received from the Foreign Office concerning you, Mr. Reed, are very alarming—very alarming indeed. The officers who examined you at the front claim to have found upon your person a false passport and letters of introduction to leaders of Jewish anti-Russian revolutionary societies. Moreover, you entered the Russian military zone without proper credentials."

"But my passport was issued in Washington," I replied, "and I had no letters to Jews of any party. All my papers were returned to me at Cholm—I have them here, if you want to see them. As for entering the army zone without credentials, I have passes from two Russian generals, the governor-general of Galicia, a letter from Prince Troubetzkoi, and a commission from the American minister at Bucarest."

Mr. Marye gave me a look of utter unbelief. "Well, Mr. Reed," he said coldly, "your statement certainly does not agree with that of the Russian Government."

What happened was this: The officers who arrested us at Cholm were very much embarrassed when they saw our passes. Recently, also, German spies had done effective work in that region, and they had suffered for it. They felt that they simply must catch some German spies. We were the goats. The list of Jewish-American citizens looked suspicious to the man who examined our papers; and besides, not understanding English, he couldn't read the documents. Perhaps, too, the staff at Cholm felt that they had been overzealous, and were afraid that they might be reprimanded for imprisoning an Englishman and an American. So some one invented these wild accusations and sent them to the Grand Duke, hoping that we would be done away with. That is how the Russian mind works.

As a matter of fact, we found out afterward that it had been decided to have us shot at Cholm. But the American and British ambassadors had insisted that we be sent to Petrograd.

I went to the American embassy next day to see what could be done. The first secretary intimated that I was a liar—since my statement and that of the Foreign Office did not agree.

"I understand," he said, "that you are to be expelled by way of Stockholm or Vladivostok. Meanwhile you had better remain quietly at your hotel."

"But the ambassador advised me to leave the country."

"Do not attempt to leave," said he emphatically, "on any account."

"But I must return to Bucarest!" I exclaimed. "Is this embassy going to allow me to be expelled by Stockholm or Vladivostok on false charges?"

He answered frigidly that the embassy could do nothing.

At the British embassy, where I went with Robinson, the first secretary simply laughed. "Why, that is perfectly ridiculous!" he said. "Of course they can't expel you from Russia! Write your story, and we will act upon the facts as you state them. H Mr. Reed wants us to, we'll be glad to include him also."

In two hours a note from the British ambassador was on its way to the Foreign Office, indorsing our credentials, and guaranteeing that our motives were innocent. A day or so later I again saw Mr. Marye in the lobby of the hotel.

"What, Mr. Reed," he said sternly, "haven't you left Russia yet?"

"Your first secretary ordered me on no account to leave."

"Ah! did he?" said the ambassador uncertainly. "But I should like to see you out of the country, Mr. Reed—your case is a great worry to me!"

In Russia the mills of God grind slowly, and they grind exceeding strange. Three weeks later, out of the clear sky came a communication to the two embassies: that Messrs. Reed and Robinson were at liberty to remain in Russia as long as they liked, but that when they departed they must leave the country by the port of Vladivostok.

"Nothing can be done—nothing," said Mr. Marye. "But I will have a talk with Mr. Sasonov."

The secretary of the British embassy was highly indignant. "Don't you go a step," he said. "The ambassador himself will protest to Mr. Sasonov immediately."

Sir George Buchanan, the British ambassador, treated the whole matter as a joke. That afternoon he was talking with the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs.

"I think you people are very short-sighted," said Sir George. "These men have done invaluable service in the American press for the Allies, and they came to Russia to write about affairs here in a friendly way. You will simply create bad feeling against Russia in America."

"Just the same," said Sasonov, "they were very naïve to enter Russia the way they did."

"Not any more naïve than your own military authorities," retorted Sir George.

A week later Mr. Marye met me in the lobby and shook me warmly by the hand.

"Well, Mr. Reed," said he, smiling, "how is your matter going on?"

"I thought you were attending to my matter, Mr. Marye," I answered. "Haven't you spoken with Mr. Sasonov?"

"I had a friendly conversation with Mr. Sasonov, who assured me that nothing could be done. Remember, Mr. Reed, it is not my fault if you get into difficulties. You recollect that I advised you frankly to leave Russia at once, and I advise you now to do so—by Vladivostok."

Ten days later we tried to escape. With a donation of thirty-five roubles the Petrograd police were persuaded to stamp our passports with the official "Free to cross the frontier"; and we left very suddenly one evening, changing cabs several times, and took the train for Kiev and Bucarest. But next morning, at Vilna, a smiling officer of gendarmérie came into our compartment and woke us up.

"A thousand pardons!" said he, without asking who we were or where we were going. "I am ordered by telegraph to ask you to leave the train here and return to Petrograd, and to leave Russia immediately by way of Vladivostok."

It took a day and a half to get back to Petrograd. No sooner were we in our hotel than two officers of the secret police materialized and notified us to go to headquarters and interview the chief.

Strangely enough, nothing was known there of our attempted flight. The chief, a sullen, bloated person with an evil face, read us the order which had just been received direct from his Highness the Grand Duke. It was dated three days before—a day before our escape—and said: "Mr. Boardman Robinson, British subject, and Mr. John Reed, American citizen, are herewith commanded to leave Petrograd for Vladivostok within twenty-four hours of the receipt of this; in case of non-compliance they are to be delivered to a military court martial and severely punished."

"Severely punished?" asked Robinson. "What if we are acquitted?"

"You will be severely punished," answered the chief woodenly.

In the meantime our interpreter looked up the train schedule; there was no train in the direction of Vladivostok within the twenty-four hours! Besides, our money had given out. All that didn't make any difference to the chief; he insisted that we must go, train or no train, money or no money.

Pursued by flocks of detectives in all sorts of disguises, we scurried to our respective embassies.

Mr. Marye refused to see me, but sent Mr. White, the second secretary.

"We cannot help you financially, Mr. Reed," he said coldly, "but the American consul, I believe, has a fund for destitute Americans."

In desperation I explained that we were ordered to leave for Vladivostok within twenty-four hours, and that there was no train. He replied indifferently that it was very doubtful if anything could be done. So I hurried to find Robinson.

Thank God, the British embassy had acted for us both. His Excellency the ambassador wired the British attaché on the staff of the Grand Duke to speak with his Highness. Moreover, Sir George went in person to the Foreign Office and protested in the name of his government. The secretary of foreign affairs telegraphed the Grand Duke, asking that the order be revoked; and over the telephone instructed the secret police to stop annoying us.

An hour later the chief of police telephoned us his apologies and said that his men had been withdrawn.

Next day a Staff officer called at our hotel, and with respectful politeness presented a note from the Grand Duke's adjutant, stating that the order of expulsion was cancelled, and that we were at liberty to proceed to Bucarest when we wished.

We didn't wait, but took the next fast train south, fearing that perhaps some one might change his mind.

The officer in command of the frontier put us in a corner of the station, and set four soldiers on us, who prodded our baggage inch by inch, ripped our wallets apart and the lining of our clothes, and virtually undressed us before the other passengers. All my papers and notes they confiscated, and all Robinson's sketches. But once over the frontier, on neutral ground, that seemed a small price to pay for getting free of the clumsy clutches of the Russian Army.

THE FACE OF RUSSIA WHOEVER has not travelled on the broad-gauge Russian railways does not know the delights of great cars half as wide again as American cars, berths too long and too ample, ceilings so high that you can stand in the upper berth. The train takes its smooth-rolling, leisurely way, drawn by wood-burning locomotives belching sweet-smelling birch smoke and showers of sparks, stopping long at little stations where there are always good restaurants. At every halt boys bring trays of tea glasses through the train, sandwiches, sweet cakes, and cigarettes. There are no specified hours for arriving anywhere, no fixed times for eating or sleeping. Often on a journey I have seen the dining-car come on at midnight, and everybody go in and have dinner with interminable conversation, lasting until time for breakfast. One man rents bed-clothes from the porter, and disrobes in full view of the rest of the company in his compartment; others turn in on the bare mattresses; and the rest sit up drinking eternal chai and endlessly arguing. Windows are shut and doors. One stifles in thick cigarette smoke, and there are snores from the upper berth, and continual movement of persons getting up, going to bed, drifting in and out. In Russia every one talks about his soul. Almost any conversation might have been taken from the pages of a Dostoevsky novel. The Russians get drunk on their talk; voices ring, eyes flash, they are exalted with a passion of self-revelation. In Petrograd I have seen a crowded café at two o'clock in the morning—of course no liquor was to be had—shouting and singing and pounding on the tables, quite intoxicated with ideas.

Outside the windows of the train the amazing country flows by, flat as a table; for hours the ancient forest marches alongside, leagues and leagues of it, untouched by the axe, mysterious and sombre. At the edge of the trees runs a dusty track along which an occasional heavy cart lumbers, its rough-coated horse surmounted by a great wooden yoke from which dangles a brass bell, the driver a great-shouldered mujik with a brutish face overhung with hair. Hours apart are little thatched towns, mere slashings in the primeval woods, built of untrimmed boards around the wooden church, with its brightpainted cupolas, and the government vodka shop—closed now—easily the most pretentious building in the village. Wooden sidewalks on stilts, unpaved alley-like streets that are sloughs of mud, immense piles of cord-wood to burn in the engine—for all the world like a railroad town in the timber of the great Northwest. Immense women with gay-colored kerchiefs around their hair and dazzling teeth, booted giants of men in peaked caps and whiskers, and priests in long, black coats and stovepipe hats with In Bin Along the -2r-i—tall pofksaen mch in cvirKxc, with tier yeQov hkwsrs-scarft revolver cords, and swords. S:Lr=. oc cccre. everywhere—by the tens of thonsanrK... Then great fields breaking suddenly from the woods and stretching to the far horizon, golden-heavy with wheat with black stamps sticking up in it.

Russians are not patriotic Eke other races. I think. The Tsar to them is not the head of the government; he is a dninity. The government itself—the bu-reaucrazy—commands no loyalty from the masses: it is like a separate nation imposed upon the Russian people. As a rule, they do not know what their flag looks like, and if they do it is not the symbol of Russia. And the Russian national hymn is a hymn, a half-mystical great song; but no one feels it necessary to rise and remove his hat when it is played. As a people, they have no sympathy with imperialism—they do not wish to make Russia a great country by conquest—in fact, they do not seem to realize that there is any world outside of Russia; that is why they fight so badly on an invasion of the enemy's country. But once let the enemy set foot on Russian soil, and the mujiks turn into savage beasts, as they did in 1812 and in 1915. Their farms, their houses, the woods and plains and holy cities are under the heel of the foreigner; that is why they fight so well on defense.

Russians seem to have a Greek feeling for the land, for the wide flat plains, the deep forests, the mighty rivers, the tremendous arch of sky that is over Russia, the churches incrusting with gold and jewels, where countless generations of their fathers have touched the ikons; for the tremendous impulses that set whole villages wandering in search of a sacred river, for the cruel hardness of the northern winter, for the fierce love and the wild gayety, and the dreadful gloom, and the myths and legends which are Russia. Once a young officer travelled with us in our compartment, and all day long he gazed out of the window at the dark woods, the vast fields, the little towns, and tears rolled down his cheeks. "Russia is a mighty mother; Russia is a mighty mother," he said over and over again...

Another time it was a middle-aged civilian with a bullet head shaved close, and wide, staring, lightblue eyes that gave him the expression of a mystic.

"We Russians do not know how great we are," he said. "We cannot grasp the idea of so many millions of people to communicate with. We do not realize how much land, how much riches we have. Why, I can tell you of one, Mr. Yousoufov of Moscow, who owns more land than he knows, whose estates are greater than the territory of any German King. And no Russian realizes how many races are embraced in this nation; I myself know only thirty-nine...."

Yet this vast chaotic agglomeration of barbarian races, brutalized and tyrannized over for centuries, with only the barest means of intercommunication, without consciousness of any one ideal, has developed a profound national unity of feeling and thought and an original civilization that spreads by its own power. Loose and easy and strong, it invades the life of the far-flung savage tribes of Asia; it crosses the frontiers into Rumania, Galicia, East Prussia—in spite of organized efforts to stop it. Even the English, who usually cling stubbornly to their way of living in all countries and under all conditions, are overpowered by Russia; the English colonies in Moscow and Petrograd are half Russian. And it takes hold of the minds of men because it is the most comfortable, the most liberal way of life. Russian ideas are the most exhilarating, Russian thought the freest, Russian art the most exuberant; Russian food and drink are to me the best, and Russians themselves are, perhaps, the most interesting human beings that exist.

They have a sense of space and time which fits them. In America we are the possessors of a great empire—but we live as if this were a crowded island like England, where our civilization came from. Our streets are narrow and our cities congested. We live in houses crushed up against one another, or in apartments, layer on layer; each family a little shut-in cell, self-centred and narrowly private. Russia is also a great empire; but there the people live as if they knew it were one. In Petrograd some streets are a quarter-mile broad and there are squares threequarters of a mile across, and buildings whose facades run on uninterrupted for half a mile. Houses are always open; people are always visiting each other at all hours of the day and night. Food and tea and conversation flow interminably; every one acts just as he feels like acting, and says just what he wants to. There are no particular times for getting up or going to bed or eating dinner, and there is no conventional way of murdering a man, or of making love. To most people a Dostoevsky novel reads like the chronicle of an insane asylum; but that, I think, is because the Russians are not restrained by the traditions and conventions that rule the social conduct of the rest of the world.

This is not only true of the great cities but of the small towns, and even the villages as well. The Russian peasant cannot be taught to tell time by the clock. He is so close to the earth, so much a part of it, that machine-made time means nothing to him. But he must be regular, or his crops will not grow; so he ploughs and plants and reaps by rain, wind, snow, and the march of the seasons—and he lives according to the sun, moon, and stars. Once the peasant is driven into the cities to work in the factories he loses the driving compulsion of nature, and when he has risen above the necessity of factory hours, there is no further reason for him to live a regular life.

We saw something of life in a Russian household; samovars perpetually steaming, servants shuffling in and out with fresh water and fresh tea-leaves, laughing and joining in the perpetual clatter of conversation. In and out flowed an unbroken stream of relatives, friends, comparative strangers. There was always tea, always a long sideboard heaped with zakouska, always a hundred little groups telling stories, loudly arguing, laughing uproariously, always little parties of card-players. Meals occurred whenever anybody got hungry—or rather there was a perpetual meal going on. Some went to bed, others rose after a long sleep and had breakfast. Day and night it never seemed to stop.

And in Petrograd we knew some people who received callers between eleven o'clock at night and dawn. Then they went to bed, and did not get up again until evening. For three years they hadn't seen daylight—except in the white nights of summer. Many interesting characters went there; among them an old Jew who had bought immunity from the police for years, and who confided to us that he had written a history of Russian political thought in five volumes; four volumes had appeared, and had been regularly confiscated upon publication—he was now engaged upon the fifth. He was always discussing politics in a loud voice, breaking off every now and then to look out of the window to see if there were any police listening. For he had been in jail once for speaking the word "socialism." Before he began to talk he would take us into a corner and in a whisper explain that when he said "daisy," that meant "socialism"; and when he said "poppy," that meant "revolution." And then he would go ahead, striding up and down the room, and shouting all sorts of destructive doctrines.

For the Russia of melodrama and of the English popular magazines still exists. I remember seeing some prisoners on the platform of a station where our train stopped. They were huddled between the tracks: two or three young stupid-looking mujiks with cropped heads, a bent old man half-blind, a Jew or so, and some women, one a mere girl with a baby. Around them was a ring of police with bared swords.

"Where are they going?" I asked the conductor.

"Siberia," he whispered out of the corner of his mouth.

"What have they done?"

"Don't ask questions," he snapped nervously. "If you ask questions in Russia that is what happens to you!"

There were some preposterous war regulations in Petrograd. If you spoke German over the telephone you were subject to a fine of three thousand roubles, and if you were heard talking German on the street the penalty was Siberia. I have it on very good authority that two professors of Oriental languages were walking down the Morskaya, speaking ancient Armenian to each other. They were arrested, and the police swore that it was German. And from that day to this they have never again been heard of.

In spite of this, however, the fact remains that any German with money could go on living in Petrograd or Moscow, and manifest his patriotism in any way he pleased. For instance, the large German colony of Moscow gave a dinner in the city's most fashionable hotel (faring November. 1914, at which German songs were chanted—addresses in German delivered which consigned the Tsar and his allies to purgatory, and shouts of "Hoch der Kaiser!" rent the air. Nothing whatever was done about this; but six months later the police determined to teach them a lesson without appearing at all prominent—which would have cut off their German revenues. Quantities of vodka were dug up from somewhere, the ikons taken from the churches, and, encouraged by the police, the mob started out to wreck German houses, shops, and hotels. After the first few of these had been demolished the people turned their attention to the French, English, and Russian establishments, shouting: "Down with the rich! You have speculated too long with our money!" Before the riot ended almost every great store in Moscow had been smashed and pillaged, and many wealthy Russians, men and women, torn from their automobiles and carriages and thrown into the canal. The Russian people of the upper classes did not disdain to take advantage of the situation. They sent their footmen and valets down to plunge into the riot, and take whatever silks and laces and furs they could lay their hands on.... As a consequence of this patriotic demonstration, the governor of the city, the governor of the province, and the chief of police were discharged from office.

How the Germans were finally removed from Moscow, is another characteristic tale of Russian methods. Did they banish them? Did they put them in detention camps? No. The police let it privately be known that if the Moscow Germans wished to leave Russia, there was a means. In Moscow, they said, it was impossible for a German to get a passport to return to his own country; but if he would go to the government of Perm, on the edge of Siberia at the base of the Ural Mountains, he could there apply for a passport and be allowed to leave. Hundreds of Germans took the hint and crowded the trains that went in the direction of Perm. They are still there.

There are four distinct sets of Russian secret police, and their main job is to supervise the regular police and to spy upon each other, besides the dvorniks, who act as concierges at your front door, and are all members of the government detective force. In times like the present, particularly, a mere suspicion is enough to send you to a military court martial, unless you have influence, or to spirit you away to Siberia.

After our arrest in Poland, when we reached Petrograd, we were dogged for weeks by municipal detectives, military secret agents, and members of the dreaded Fourth Arm—the sinister most secret police of all. But a Russian detective is easily recognizable; whatever his disguise, whether as workman, mujik, cab-driver, or loafer, he invariably wears patent-leather shoes and carries a silver-headed cane. A little group of them always stood in front of our hotel door, and during the long wearisome evenings we would often throw bottles at them out of the window. Whenever we took a cab to go to the American embassy, a detective detached himself from the group and followed us in another cab. And when we swung into the Nevski we would stop and wait for him to round the corner, which he did at a fast trot, thinking us far ahead, and then we would follow him for hours, to his intense discomfiture.

You cannot leave Russia without a "foreign vise" stamped on your passport by the city police, permitting you to cross the frontier. We were, of course, under surveillance of the city police; nevertheless, by a present of thirty-five roubles, we got our foreign vise, and took the train for the Rumanian border. At Vilna the next morning a major of the military police came into our compartment, and without asking who we were or where we were going, announced that we must return to Petrograd. There we found secret agents of the Fourth Arm waiting for us to conduct us to the chief's headquarters. But the chief did not know that we had obtained a foreign vise, or even that we had tried to flee; he simply wanted to read us a peremptory order from the Grand Duke expelling us from Russia by way of Vladivostok for an imaginary offense.

In our hotel in Petrograd lived a squat, powerful woman who looked like an Eskimo, and had coarse hair bobbed like the roached mane of a Shetland pony. Her name was Princess. In the late afternoon she used to come into the tea-room, pick out a man that pleased her, and hold up her immense room-key in bald, frank invitation. This did not offend the Russians; but the hotel was full of American business men and their wives, and they complained to the manager about the scandal. The manager ordered the princess to leave the hotel; she refused. So, Russian-like, one day when she was out he took her bed apart and removed it, with every other piece of furniture, from her room. She returned to the hotel, and for several hours stamped up and down the lobby calling him every name she could think of. Then she went out. Fifteen minutes later a secret-police official drove up in an automobile, descended upon the manager, and informed him that if he ever molested that woman again he would go to Siberia. The princess was an agent of the Fourth Arm....

THE NATIONAL INDUSTRY FROM Zalezchik to Tamopol we were alone in our compartment, but in the next one were four or five shaven-bearded colonels and majors, their boots highly polished, their drab blouses ablaze with decorations. Windows were closed, belts unloosened, swords hung up. On a little wooden stand was a great brass samovar, steaming, and a wooden box of cigarettes overflowing on the table. They smoked and drank tea and talked about their souls.

Moved by Russian curiosity and Russian hospitality, the major, speaking bad French, came into our compartment and introduced himself, and began telling all the military secrets he knew—where his regiment was, how many men it comprised, how it was planned to throw them across the Pruth the next night in the dark and surprise a cluster of Austrian batteries. This was not indiscretion on his part; simply, it was no fun to talk about these things to people who knew them already—and he was perfectly delighted to find strangers who seemed interested. He took us into his compartment, and the others made room, plied us with tea and cigarettes, eagerly questioned us about ourselves, our business, how much salary we got, did they drink much whiskey in America, was Newport as smart as the Riviera, and what we thought of the war. Then the original discussion was resumed, this time in broken French and German for our benefit. Each man had been telling about his first sexual experience; from that they entered upon a discussion of the psychology of sex, its relation to artistic energy, the power it had over the lives of men....

Only toward evening did we discover their business. They were a commission of officers sent by General Dimitriev to discover the whereabouts of seventeen million bags of flour, which were lost.

Now seventeen million bags of flour, if assembled, would loom as large as the city of Poughkeepsie; yet it had vanished. It seemed that the Russian Government had bought, caused to be ground and packed the seventeen million bags as a provision for the Southwestern Armies for the year. The flour was shipped from Kiev to Tamopol, a distance of two hundred and thirty versts, along a line of railroad crossed only twice by other lines; and yet within that one hundred and eighty odd miles more than thirty train-loads of flour had absolutely disappeared from the face of the earth.

"But where can it have gone?" I asked.

The grizzled colonel shrugged his shoulders with a smile. "We have reason to believe," said he, "that it was sold to the Rumanians and then shipped into Austria." He sighed. "Such things will happen...."

Graft in Russia is on such a naively vast scale that it becomes almost grotesque.

During the Japanese War the French Government sent fifty batteries of 75 guns to the Russian army. They were registered as having passed the frontier, but strangely enough they never officially arrived in Russia. Six months later a French military officer in Brazil signalled to his government the presence of several Creusot 75 field-pieces. Since every gun that leaves the Creusot Works is registered, the company officials were puzzled, because no guns had even been sold to the Brazilian army. Upon comparing serial numbers, however, they turned out to be the ones shipped to Russia in 1905.

I have another story from the Russian representative of a foreign ship-building concern, who told me of a battleship which he personally designed for the Russian Government at that same time. The plans were accepted, the steel contracted for, an army of working men assembled at Odessa, and in the course of time it was reported that the battleship was ready for launching. The governor of the province personally broke a champagne-bottle over her bow, and a month later she put to sea on her trial trip. Then news came that the battleship had sunk somewhere in the Black Sea. Some one was suspicious—an investigation was ordered, and it developed that the battleship had never been built at all.

In 1909, a French general visiting the Tsar was invited by his majesty to go down to Poland and inspect a great new modern fort which had just been built near Warsaw. The military governor to whom he applied assured him that the country was in a very unsettled condition, and that it would be unwise to visit the fort without a proper military escort—and he could not spare soldiers for that. After combating all sorts of obstructions and evasions, the general lost his temper and insisted on going to see the fort alone. There was of course no fort.

At the most serious epoch of the Russian retreat last summer, when whole divisions were annihilated because of the lack of ammunition for their cannon, I met an Englishman who had come to Russia three months before with a ship-load of shrapnel. He said it was still at Archangel—because he would not bribe the railway and ordinance officials to ship it to the front....

A French steel manufacturer of Moscow contracted to furnish several million shells for the Russian artillery. Many car-loads were sent to the front, but when they arrived it was found that they did not fit the Russian cannon; so they were left behind on the retreat, and the Germans used them with entire success. Summoned before an investigating commission, the Frenchman produced his specifications, drawn up and signed by the Minister of War, Mr. Soukominov.

Now Mr. Soukominov had been a comparatively poor man before the war; but after the commencement of hostilities he began to buy large blocks of Petrograd real estate, and it was freely said by people on the inside that he had been quite simply selling military secrets to the Germans. Later he resigned under a cloud of suspicion, which must have been grave indeed, as he was one of the leaders of the Reactionaries.

I was in Petrograd when a certain colonel drove up one day in front of the establishment of a friend of mine who sold automobile tires. The colonel had fifty motor ambulances, just then in great need at the front, and he asked my friend to look them over and estimate what it would cost to put new tires on the entire fifty. The salesman named the figure.

"And how much do I get out of it?" asked the colonel.

"The customary ten per cent."

"All right, then, go ahead."

The salesman came out and looked at the tires.

"Why," he said, "you don't need new tires on these cars. They are almost new!"

"You mind your own business!" snapped the colonel. "Put those tires on, and don't talk too much about it if you know what's good for you!"

American business men selling supplies to the Russian Government had endless stories of the sublime voracity of the purchasing department. It did not make any difference how good the product—the question invariably asked was: "How much do I get?" In many cases, when the company could not afford to pay a large graft, the Russians themselves raised the prices to their own government.

Suppose you had an automobile truck to sell. It was demonstrated before a commission which made a secret report to one of the officials of the Intendancy, who summoned you to consultation. Now, by a little gift of twenty or thirty dollars you had discovered that your product had been favorably reported on, or you had arranged that it would be favorably reported on by a similar gift to the other members of the commission.

Upon entering the office of the Intendancy official, he would say: "Your automobile has been recommended very highly. But there are also other automobiles. I must consider your proposition." He would look at his watch. "Excuse me for a moment, I must run out. By the way, wouldn't you like a cigarette?" and, handing you his cigarette-case, he would leave you there. Perhaps you opened the cigarette-case and found it empty. And if you had been in Russia long you would extract from your pocket a five-hundred-rouble note, and slip it into the cigarette-box. When the officer returned he would say: "Now, about prices. What commission do I get?" You would arrange that to his satisfaction, and he would tell you to wait for his answer at your hotel.

But, of course, it was all a gamble. Somebody else might have put a thousand-rouble note in the cigarettebox.... There were, of course, other ways of notifying prospective salesmen that they had to "come across." For example, a number of professional "intermediaries" hung around the hotels frequented by Americans, hinting that such an official ought to be "greased," and so forth.

But the whole business was so frank and greedy that, even with the best intentions in the world, the secret police could not fail to stumble on some gigantic system of fraud every two or three days. Exposure after exposure revealed that the entire Intendancy was nothing but a mass of corruption; but the trail always led so far and so high that it had to be choked off. Princes and barons and financiers and army officers and cabinet ministers were implicated. Even the Grand Duke Serge, chief of the Department of Artillery Munitions, was suspected, and the Tsar's household was not free from calumny. Banks were seized and safe-deposit boxes broken open, and enough documents found to convict practically the whole bureaucracy. Persons high in power one day were replaced the next. Sometimes you went to the Intendancy to see an official with whom you had talked three hours previously, and found a new man in his place.

"Where is Colonel Verchovsky?" you asked.

Sometimes the newcomer replied briefly, "Siberia"; sometimes he shrugged his shoulders; and sometimes he lit a match, let it burn a little while, and then gracefully blew it out.

A PATRIOTIC REVOLUTION THE war-time traveller in Russia was immediately struck with Russian commercial dependence upon Germany. In Petrograd I tried to buy an antiseptic mouth-wash. "Ah," said the drug clerk, a German himself, by the way, "all such preparations come from Germany—we cannot get them now." And so with cameras, with films, with milk-chocolate, with clothing, automobiles, typewriters. There was even no good surgeon in Petrograd, no physician who was a specialist in diseases of the intestines; the reply was: "We always send such cases to Berlin."

For the last ten years Russia has become more and more a German commercial colony. Every embarrassment of Russia was taken advantage of by Germany to increase her trade advantages in the empire; as, for example, in 1905, German interests exacted enormous concessions by overt threats of aiding the revolutionists. The Germans also crept into government offices, even into the army administration. They dictated the plans of the Russian strategic railways on the German frontier. And in the Imperial Court, in the entourage of the Tsarina—herself a German—they exercised a sinister and powerful influence.

Russian merchants, manufacturers, and bankers have long bitterly opposed the German power in their country, and this has made them enemies of the corrupt and tyrannical Russian Government—which is bound up with the Germans—and allies of the revolutionists. So in this war we have the curious spectacle of the Russian proletariat and the middle class both intensely patriotic, and both opposing the government of their country. And to understand Russia now one must realize the paradox that to make war on Germany is to make war on the Russian bureaucracy.

When I was in Russia, in June, the internal struggle was at its height. A vast organization existed, even in the highest places of the government, to betray Russia to the enemy. A secret wireless station which intercepted military messages and transmitted them to Germany was discovered in a chimney of the Winter Palace itself. Besides the Soukotlinov scandal, there was also the case of General Masdeiev, who did a thriving export business in plans of Russian fortresses until somebody squealed.

After the battle of Tannenberg General Rennenkampf bitterly accused his own officers of selling him out; and in Russia they say that that was one of the reasons he was removed from command. The same thing is also said to be one of the reasons why the Grand Duke Nicholas was transferred to the Caucasus; at any rate, his bitter criticism of the Germans in the Imperial Court and the government were a matter of common knowledge.

Where does the Tsar stand in relation to all this? In Russia, the more you hear about him, the more fantastic and legendary he becomes. In Petrograd I knew an American fortune-teller who said he was a friend of the Emperor—and in proof of it produced a great platinum cigarette-case embossed with the Imperial monogram in diamonds, and with the gold relief of an outstretched hand; this, he said, the Tsar had given him in reward for his services in foretelling the fall of Warsaw. During the week before that event the Tsar had summoned him three times to Tsarskoe Selo, to read the Imperial palm and predict from its lines whether Warsaw would be taken by the Germans. The fortune-teller, who read the newspapers, said that it would. And it did.

Men who have talked with the Tsar assured me that he knew little that was going on in the empire, except what his reactionary advisers chose to tell him.

The fortune-teller had had many curious contacts with the Imperial Court. For instance, he said that several years ago he had been suddenly summoned from Vienna to Sebastopol, and taken out to the Imperial yacht, lying off the harbor; there he found a concourse of surgeons, homeopaths, faith-healers, and all sorts of quacks from every part of Europe. They had been gathered to save the life of the young Tsarovitch, who had been stabbed in the hip by a revolutionist sailor. That, said the fortune-teller, was the basis for all those later stories of the Tsarovitch's mysterious illness.

He had also run foul of Rasputin, the lay monk, that sinister figure whose power over the Tsarina, men say, is so evil and profound. The fortune-teller showed me an almost illegible scrawl of bad French which he had received the week previously, and which ran approximately as follows:

"Father Gregory Rasputin asks me to inform you that he is cognizant of your visits to Tsarskoe Selo. He has no objection to your interviewing the Emperor; but if you are summoned by the Empress, and visit her, your stay in Russia is likely to be very unpleasant."

Now, these things may not be true; but they are no more preposterous than other details of the life of that Oriental hierarchy—and no more impossible than the well-known fact that many members of the Duma came to have their palms read by this same fortune-teller on political questions.

Under the surface of the vast, restless sea of Russian life mighty currents rush obscurely to and fro. Crusades, revolutions, religious schisms, and tremendous popular movements go on; rarely they burst up into the light where they can be seen and judged, but one is always conscious of them. The great revolution of 1905 broke the surface, and at the outbreak of this war another revolution was ready to break, beginning with a gigantic general strike. Its sharp alarms were lost in the roar of mobilization and the barbaric pageantry of Imperial proclamations—promises by the Tsar of a more liberal government, of autonomy for Poland, of reform for the Jews. Probably the mobilization impressed the revolutionists more than the proclamations; for not only were the promises made in the Imperial manifesto of 1905 not carried out, but in some respects things were worse than they ever had been. The Duma was in existence, but by changing the rules of procedure and using the police to terrorize provincial elections, the government had robbed it of all its hard-won prerogatives. The freedom of the press had been promised, but during the Beiliss trial that great paper, the Russkoe Slovo, was fined thousands of roubles for publishing reports of the proceedings. And that was a rich and powerful journal; other periodicals could not afford to publish anything at all. Free speech was promised, but you had to get a police permit for a public meeting—and in Russia the police are not very indulgent. Religious freedom was promised, and freedom of conscience; but recently the Minister of the Interior closed the Unified Catholic church in Petrograd, and others in other towns, on the ground that they violated the building code. The inviolability of the person was guaranteed and the right of trial, but never have so many people been kidnapped to Siberia, without even an accusation against them, as now.

In the face of the wholesale corruption of the purchasing department of the government, the Association of Zemstvos, or county councils, undertook to buy army supplies for the government—a job which it accomplished with real ability. This is an important fact, as the Association represented to a large extent the Russian middle class.

All this time the Duma, limited as it was, had been getting more and more frankly critical. For example, one speaker said that Russia had a government which was extraordinarily inefficient, extraordinarily corrupt, and extraordinarily traitorous. In addition, it began to name specific grafters and traitors and hinted where the trail led, and it recommended that committees of the Duma be put in charge of the buying of supplies, in conjunction with the Zemstvos, and also the manufacture of munitions. Besides all this, there was rapidly growing popular unrest manifested all over the empire. And it was the discontent of patriots that determined Russia should win the war.

On September 8 the Grand Duke Nicholas was superseded by the Tsar in command of the western front. The people looked upon this as a very doubtful move and wondered what lay back of it; for the Grand Duke was at least honest, and the Tsar had called to his pavilion at the front Mr. Soukominov, who was not trusted. An important Russian general stated that it meant that the Tsar was about to make a separate peace; at any rate, the ambassadors of the Entente Powers tried for three weeks to dissuade his Majesty from assuming command.

One amazing rumor generally credited by intelligent people declared that the Tsar had been forced to take command by Rasputin, who had interpreted visions of the Most High commanding that this be done. It is not improbable.

On September 15 a strike was declared by the thirty thousand workmen in the Poteelov Armament Works in Petrograd, and the next day proclamations were posted on the street corners forbidding gatherings of workmen. Members of the foreign colonies, on account of the confidential information from the War Office, began hurriedly to leave Russia. On the following morning it was reported that thirty workmen from the Poteelov Works, who had presented a petition to the Duma on the 15th, had been banished to Siberia with their families. Riots followed in which soldiers fired on the strikers, and on the same day the Tsar suddenly dissolved the Duma. In Petrograd it was known that all the members of the cabinet were opposed to the dissolution except the Reactionary premier, Goremykin. At the same time proclamations were posted calling new troops to the colors—which increased the general dissatisfaction—and on the 18th new posters appeared threatening that the strikers would be either sent to the trenches or given indefinite terms of imprisonment in Siberia, unless they returned to work on the following Tuesday, and unless thereafter they obeyed orders.

During these days spasmodic strikes on the railways caused a shortage of food and fuel in Petrograd, and severe suffering followed among the population. A cholera epidemic broke out. The papers every day published long lists of deaths, calling them euphemistically "death from stomach trouble," and the official organs announced that during the winter there would be a shortage of everything except flour.

On the 20th, news came of strikes in Kiev, Odessa, and other cities, and of the complete paralysis of the street-cars and electric-light plants in Moscow. The Association of Zemstvos and the Association of Cities sent a committee direct to the Tsar, threatening that unless he liberalized the government they would favor revolution, and declaring emphatically the absolute necessity of a liberal ministry responsible to the Duma. The Tsar refused to receive the delegation.

Is there a powerful and destructive fire working in the bowels of Russia, or is it quenched? Rigid censorship and the suppression of news within the empire make it very difficult to know; but even after the prorogation of the Duma there were wholesale dismissals of Intendancy officials, and a complete military reorganization of the western armies, and even as I write this some powerful, quiet menace, as yet vaguely defined, has forced the Tsar to reopen the Duma with Imperial pomp. And Boris Stunner, the new premier, though a Reactionary of the worst type, has assured the Duma that "even in war time the work of internal reorganization must go on."

In the White Russian town of Rovno I had a talk with a young volunteer non-commissioned officer, who had been clerk in a Petrograd bank before the war. The revolution of 1905, he explained, was not a revolution at all; it was a gigantic scandal. It was the instinctive revolt of millions of human beings against robbery and tyranny that were absolutely absurd. "That is all over," he said hastily, for after all he belonged to the governing class. "But," he added, "after this war we shall ask for a new constitution."

"And what if they don't give it to you?" said I. "Will there be a revolution?"

"Oh, I think they will give it to us. But if not— well, we must have it!"

"And how about the Jews?"

"The Jews!" he cried. "What has democracy to do with the Jews? We do not want the Jews in Russia. Why don't they all go to America, or to the devil?" THE BETRAYAL OF THE JEWS AT the beginning of the war French, English, and 1 JL American newspapers published accounts of proclamations by the Tsar and the Grand Duke "to our faithful Jewish subjects." They were promised liberty of residence in all parts of Russia, removal of civic disabilities, freedom of worship, and, finally, the highest ranks of the army and the grades of nobility were opened to them.

On the strength of this news, which seemed significant of great, deep change, hundreds of Russian Jews returned from exile to enlist in the armies of the Tzar, and the Jewish women offered their services to the Russian Red Cross. Their reward was this: The men, disillusioned and bitter, died in the trenches defending their oppressors—and the women nurses were outraged in the hospitals by the soldiers they tended. For the truth was that no such proclamations had been issued in Russia. It was all a lie invented in London and Paris by Russian Government agents, to hoodwink the Liberal peoples of the world.

I dined with a captain of Atamanski

Cossacks at headquarters in a Bessarabian village near the front. He was telling of his regiment:

"They are such impetuous fellows, the officers cannot always hold them; when they come into a village where there are Jews, for example. Ah, the rascals! When they get to killing Jews they cannot be halted!"

"Speaking of Jews," remarked an infantry captain across the table, "a very funny thing happened when my company was stationed at Brest-Litovsk. A young Jewish soldier one day was seen to kiss the hand of an old rabbi. My men were furious; they kicked and cuffed him well, and then buried his face in a pile of ordure."

Robinson protested. But the colonel at the head of the table held up his hand gravely.

"You Americans," he said, "do not understand what we have to endure from these people. The Jews are all traitors to Russia."

I remarked that that was curious, because in Austria and Germany they were entirely loyal, and in fact had subscribed the greater part of the last two Austrian war loans.

"That is different," replied the colonel firmly. "In Germany and Austria the Jews have civil rights; therefore naturally they are patriotic. In Russia, however, the Jews have no civil rights. So they betray us. So we kill them."

He seemed perfectly satisfied with this explanation, and the others did, too. ...

For two hundred miles we travelled behind the Russian front through Bucovina and Galicia into Poland, and everywhere were evidences of the horrors inflicted on the Jews. Village after village of whitewashed, brightly painted little mud houses was sacked and smashed—especially the houses where Jews had lived—by the Cossacks or the Russian soldiers. Zalezchik, where thousands of Jews had lived, was a mass of ruins, and the population had been driven out toward the enemy in front of the Russian advance. In Rovno there had been anti-Semitic riots, and in Kielze, Poland, a real old-fashioned pogrom—wholesale slaughter by the Cossacks. I have told in another place the stories of the Jew apothecary of Zalezchik and the Jew hotel-keeper in Cholm, and what a small town in the Pale of Settlement looks like. In Vilna twenty thousand Jews, men, women, and children, were torn from their homes and sent to Siberia, on the wholesale charge that they were plotting treachery. And it was in Vilna that two English war correspondents were arrested as spies and taken to the police court. They had a small black despatch-bag, which the police commanded them to open. They refused to do so. Then the police brought in a Jew with his hands bound and his back bare, and proceeded to beat him with whips.

"Do you see what we are doing with this Jew?" said the chief of police. "Well, then, you had better open that bag...."

Everywhere the same old terror for the Jews, the same hate and fear of priests and Cross and the name of Jesus Christ.

On the train to Lemberg we got into a compartment with two minor officials of the postal service, who were typical of the great mass of Russian bureaucrats.

"Civil rights for the Jews!" cried one in astonishment. "You are mad! The Russian people would not allow it. As for the official ranks of the army being open to Jews, that is ridiculous. Their own men would shoot them as soon as they gave an order. I know only two Jewish officers in the Russian army, and they are detailed for clerical work in the War Department. Their fathers, you see, are rich. But they would not dare to go on active service." PETROGRAD AND MOSCOW MOST travellers speak of Moscow as the Heart of Russia, the real Russian city, and dismiss Petrograd as an imitation of other European capitals. But to me Petrograd seems more characteristically Russian—with its immense facades of government buildings and barracks marching along as far as the eye can reach, broad streets, and mighty open spaces. The great stone quays along the Neva, the palaces, cathedrals, and Imperial avenues paved with cobbles grew under the hands of innumerable serfs chained in a swamp by the will of a tyrant, and were cemented with their blood; for where Petrograd now sprawls for miles and miles, a city built for giants, was nothing but a feverish marsh a hundred and fifty years ago. And there, where no roads naturally lead, the most desolate spot, the most vulnerable and the most remote from any natural centre of the Russian Empire, Peter the Great had a whim to found his capital. Twenty thousand workmen a year for ten years were killed by fever, cold, and disease in the building of Petrograd. Nine times the court nobles themselves conspired to wreck the hated city and force the court to return to Moscow; three times they set fire to it, and three times the Tsar hung them at the doors of the palaces he had forced them to build. A powerful section of the Reactionary party has always agitated for the restoration of Moscow as capital, and it is only in the last twenty years that the population of Petrograd has not been artificially kept up.

Great canals of deep, sombre water curve through the city everywhere, and along these move vast wooden barges hundreds of feet long, piled high with birchwood for burning—cut in the gloom of ancient forests with ringing axes, and floated down flat, deserted rivers to the sound of slow minor boat songs under the northern lights. And into the dark water every night obscure and restless, miserable poor throw themselves—multitudes of them. Their bodies go out with the tide, under the frowning interminable barracks, slipping through the caves beneath the streets, and float to sea on the broad Neva along that splendid front of palaces yellow and barbarically red, those fantastic cupolas and pinnacles and gigantic monuments.

In the immense silent squares and wide streets the people are lost; in spite of its two millions or more of human beings Petrograd seems perpetually empty. Only on summer evenings, in the enormous amusement parks, among the open-air theatres, scenic railways, merry-go-rounds, and cafes, hundreds of thousands of people, in great masses and currents of shouting, laughing, singing humanity, move aimlessly to and fro, with a feeling of uncontrollable force like the sea. Or in time of revolution, or during some important religious festival, when the people choke miles of great streets from wall to wall, and the thunder of their untimed feet, the roar of their unorganized singing, the power of their spontaneous will dwarfs even that Imperial City.

On the day of the fiesta of Our Lady of Kazan I was caught at the corner of the Nevski Prospekt and the Morskaia by sudden inundations of great mobs pouring toward the cathedral from every street, hats off, faces exultingly raised, deep voices lifting simple slow hymns. Over their heads swam the jewelled and glittering ikons, upheld by bareheaded, bearded, giant priests in rich vestments all covered with gold. Small choir-boys swung censers. Flanking the holy procession, peasant women walked sideways, hand in hand, with blank exalted faces, guarding the ikons. Men and women crowded in single file to pass under the sacred images, screaming, kicking, and pulling each other; and every few minutes the priests lowered them while a hundred kneeling people flung themselves forward to kiss the pictures with their lips. And all the time the processions moved slowly on in that terrible sea of people, meeting, crossing, wavering over the heads of the crowd, flashing back the sun that burst out between clouds. And for hours a solid mile and a half of people blocked the Nevski Prospekt and all the streets adjoining before the Cathedral of Our Lady of Kazan, praying and crossing themselves with a fluttering motion, and singing.

With Russians religion is extraordinarily alive. On the streets people cross themselves incessantly, especially when passing the churches, and the cabdrivers lift their hats and touch forehead, breast, and shoulders whenever they see an ikon. Little chapels are open all day long, even in the fashionable shopping quarters, and there are continual services for the constantly flowing crowds that stop to kneel and kiss the holy images as they pass. In certain very holy churches and shrines there is always, day and night, a jam of people, kneeling, bowing, muttering before the ikonostas. But, as far as I could discover, religion in Russia does not seem to be a temporal power, or a matter of politics, or a moral or ethical rule of life. The priests have often mean, vicious faces, and monks in the great monasteries lead the extravagantly dissolute lives of rich and unrestrained ecclesiastics everywhere; and the church, like all powerful churches, lives fatly and builds its golden altar-screens from the contributions of the poor, by playing on their darkest superstitions. To the simple Russian peasant, however, his religion is a source of spiritual force, both a divine blessing on his undertakings and a mystical communion with God. The thief and the murderer go to kiss the ikons before robbing a house or killing a man. The revolutionists carry the ikons at the head of their ranks, and the mobs that shoot them down also have ikons. In every Russian house an ikon hangs in the corner of the room, and in every hotel and railway-station.

Great religious fervors shake the Russian people, as they did the Jews and the Arabs, splitting them into innumerable mystical sects. Miracles occur frequently; holy men and self-torturing saints wander about the country, healing and preaching strange gospels. Even in Petrograd, the least religious of Russian cities, priests and monks were everywhere, and one of them, Gregory Rasputin, was rumored to be almost the real ruler of the empire.

At night—for it was June—the sun sank slower and slower. At nine o'clock it was as light as late summer evenings at home; at half past ten the sun touched the horizon, and moved slowly around from west to east until half past two in the morning, when it rose again. If you happened to wake up at midnight it was impossible to tell whether it was night or day—especially since the Russians seemed to have no regular hours for going to bed. Outside our window in St. Isaac's Square people would be sitting on the benches reading their newspapers; before the house doors squatted the dvorniks huddled in their shubas, gossiping; cabs drove past, and people went along the sidewalk, and there were even shops open.

Sometimes we drove. "Izrusschik!" I cried, standing in the middle of the street, and immediately there materialized from nowhere twenty or thirty little cabs driven by hairy individuals crowned with glazed, bell-shaped hats with curling brims, and padded under their coats so as to appear monstrously fat. Driving round and round us, they screamed hideously their competitive prices. There was a municipal tariff for cabs, and a copy of it was posted on the back of the driver's seat; but you had to pay at least double the prices on it. And the police always took the cabman's part.

We roamed around the city in the interminable twilight. In front of the barracks dense little crowds surrounded some soldier leaping and kicking on his hams a peasant dance, perhaps from Siberia, to the breathless braying of an accordion. In St. Isaac's Square the new recruits by companies were stamping through their drill, with resounding great boots, and roaring the traditional regimental answers to the greeting of a general.

"Good morning, my children!" cried a high, flat voice.

"Good morning to your Generalship!" bellowed a hundred big men in unison.

"I congratulate you, my children!"

"Happy to have had the opportunity, your Generalship!"

Three or four times a day the bell-ringers in the ponderous cupolas of St. Isaac's Cathedral looped the bell-ropes about their elbows, knees, feet, and hands, and all the great and little bells began to boom and jangle—thirty-five of them—in a wild, dissonant ragtime:

Teeeng! Tong! Teeeng-ting-a-tang-tong! Boom! Boontick-a-ting-tingle-ingle-boom! Tang-tong-tick-a-tangle-tongle-boom-ting-tingle-tick-a-tangleboom!

By hundreds, by thousands the new recruits, still in their peasant clothes, with big numbers chalked on their backs, passed by. There seemed no end to them. Day after day and week after week they poured into Petrograd, and had been pouring in for more than a year, to be roughly whipped into shape, loaded on endless trains, and hurled carelessly westward or south to choke with the slaughter of sheer numbers the terrible German machine.... And yet everywhere on the streets, and all over Russia, I saw multitudes of fresh men who had not yet been called to the colors.

Moscow, known affectionately to all Russians as Matuschka Moskva, "Little Mother Moscow," is still the Holy City, the intellectual capital, and the last stronghold of the old splendid barbaric Russia. Moscow's streets are narrow, and her cities crowd wall within wall around the sacred citadel which epitomizes all the history of the empire. But the pulse of Russia and the red renewing blood and the flow of change have left Moscow. Her ancient and opulent commerce, however, that made Muscovite merchant princes a legend in Europe in the Middle Ages, is still growing. The number of buildings of modern German architecture strikes one immediately.

That wideness and vastness and lavish disregard of human life so characteristic of Petrograd, of the war, and of Russia as it seemed to me, again appears in the Kremlin, where for a thousand years the hopes and the longings and the faith of the Russian people were centred. The Red Square is as gigantic as any square in the new capital, and immeasurably ancient. Cyclopean red walls, crenellated and topped with fantastic towers, pierced with gates in whose gloom hang great staring ikons, stride down-hill, and along the bank of the river, proudly encircling the most insolently rich capitol in the world. Inside, upon one square, within a hundred yards of each other, stand four cathedrals, each with an altarscreen of solid gold and jewels, glittering up from the long ranks of the tombs of Tsars, into the cloud of blue incense that forever palls a ceiling inlaid with monstrous mosaics. Ivan Veliki leans upward, honeycombed with great bells. Miles of palaces twist and turn, whose rooms are furnished in solid slabs of gold and pillars of semiprecious stones—Imperial throneroom after throne-room, to the gaudy, half-savage apartments where Ivan the Terrible lived, and the treasury that holds the Peacock Throne of Persia, and the Golden Throne of the Tartars, and the Diamond Throne of the Tsars. Monasteries, barracks, ancient arsenals along whose facades are piled the thousands of cannon that Napoleon left on the road from Moscow; the huge bell of Boris Godounov cracked and lying on the ground; the Tsar cannon, too big for any charge—and out through the Spasskya Gate, with the soldiers on guard to see that you remove your hat when you pass under the Ikon of the Redeemer....

On Sunday we took the steamer up the river to the Sparrow Hills, where Napoleon stood to watch Moscow burning. Along the river for miles people were bathing from the bank, groups of men and women, and all over the hills swarmed an immense multitude making holiday. They sprawled on the grass, ran races, moved in big singing droves under the trees; and in little hollows and flat places accordions jiggled, while the wild stamping dances went on. There were drunken people haranguing huge audiences, and senseless men asleep, clutching bottles in their hands, and cripples and idiots followed by laughing throngs, like a mediaeval fair. An old woman in rags came hobbling down the hill, her hair streaming about her face, lifted arms with clinched fists over her head, shouting hysterically. A man and a girl pounded each other with their fists, weeping. On a high point of land stood a soberly dressed man with his hands clasped behind his back, evidently making a speech to the restless flowing crowds beneath him. There was in the air a feeling of recklessness and gloom, as if anything might happen....

We sat a long time in the cafe at the top of the hill, looking out over the plain where the river made a great curve, while the sun sank westward over the innumerable bulbs and cupolas of golden, green, blue, pink, and clashing colors of the four hundred churches of Moscow. And as we sat there, far, faintly, and wild came the galloping clangor of countless bells, beating out the rhythm that has in it all the deep solemnity and mad gayety of Russia.

IV CONSTANTINOPLE TOWARD THE CITY OF EMPERORS THE handsome great sleeping-cars bore brass inscriptions in svelte Turkish letters and in French, "Orient Express"—that most famous train in the world, which used to run from Paris direct to the Golden Horn in the prehistoric days before the war. A sign in Bulgarian said "Tsarigrad"—literally "City of Emperors"—also the Russian name for the eastern capital that all Slavs consider theirs by right. And a German placard proclaimed pompously, "BerlinConstantinople"—an arrogant prophecy in those days, when the Constantinople train went no farther west than Sofia, and the drive on Serbia had not begun.

We were an international company: Three English officers in mufti bound for Dedeagatch; a French engineer on business to Philippopolis; a Bulgar military commission going to discuss the terms of the treaty with Turkey; a Russian school-teacher returning to his home in Burgas; an American tobacco man on a buying tour around the Turkish Black Sea ports; a black eunuch in fez, his frock coat flaring over wide hips and knock knees; a Viennese musichall dancer and her man headed for the cafe" concerts of Pera; two Hungarian Red Crescent delegates, and assorted Germans to the number of about a hundred. There was a special car full of bullet-headed Krupp workmen for the Turkish munition factories, and two compartments reserved for an Unterseeboot crew going down to relieve the men of U-54—boys seventeen or eighteen years old. And in the next compartment to mine a party of seven upper-class Prussians played incessant "bridge": government officials, business men, and intellectuals on their way to Constantinople to take posts in the embassy, the Regie, the Ottoman Debt, and the Turkish universities. Each was a highly efficient cog, trained to fit exactly his place in the marvellous German machine that ground already for the Teutonic Empire of the East.

The biting irony of life in neutral countries went with us. It was curious to watch the ancient habit of cosmopolitan existence take possession of that train-load. Some ticket agent with a sense of humor had paired two Englishmen with a couple of German embassy attaches in the same compartment—they were scrupulously polite to each other. The Frenchman and the other Britisher gravitated naturally to the side of the fair Austrian, where they all laughed and chattered about youthful student days in Vienna. Late at night I caught one of the German diplomats out in the corridor gossiping about Moscow with the Russian teacher. All these men were active on the firing-line, so to speak, except the Russian—and he, of course, was a Slav, and without prejudices....

But in the morning the English, the Frenchman, and the Russian were gone—the breathing-place between borders of hate was past—and we fled through the grim marches of the Turkish Empire.

The shallow, sluggish, yellow Maritza River, bordered by gigantic willows, twisted through an arid valley. Dry, brown hills rolled up, on whose slopes no green thing grew; flat plains baked under scanty scorched grass; straggly corn-fields lay drooping, with roofed platforms on stilts starting up here and there, where black-veiled women squatted with guns across their knees to scare away the crows. Rarely a village—miserable huts of daubed mud, thatched with dirty straw, clustering around the fiat dome of a little mosque and its shabby minaret. Westward, a mile away, the ruins of a red-tiled town climbed the hillside, silent and deserted since the Bulgarians bombarded it in 1912, and shot off the tips of the two minarets. The crumbling stumps of minarets stood alone on the desolate flats, marking the spot of some once-living village or town whose very traces had disappeared—so quickly do the ephemeral buildings of the Turks return to the dust; but the minarets stand, for it is forbidden to demolish a mosque that has once been consecrated.

Sometimes we stopped at a little station; a group of huts, a minaret, adobe barracks, and rows of mudbricks baking in the sun. A dozen gayly painted little arabas slung high on their springs waited for passengers; six or seven veiled women would crowd into one, pull the curtains to shield them from the public gaze, and rattle giggling away in a cloud of golden dust. Bare-legged peasant hanums, robed all in dull green, shuffled single file along the road, carrying naked babies, with a coquettish lifting of veils for the windows of the train. By the platform were piled shimmering heaps of melons brought from the interior—the luscious green sugar-melon, and the yellow kavoon, 'which smells like flowers and tastes like nothing else in the world. An ancient tree beside the station spread an emerald shade over a tiny cafe", where the turbaned, slippered old Turks of the country sat gravely at their coffee and narghilehs.

Along the railway, aged bent peasants, unfit for the firing-line, stood guard—bare-footed, ragged, armed with rusty hammer-lock muskets and belted with soft-nosed bullets of an earlier vintage still. They made a pathetic effort to straighten up in military attitudes as we passed.... But it was at Adrianople that we saw the first regular Turkish soldiers, in their unfitting khaki uniforms, puttees, and those German-designed soft helmets that look like Arab turbans, and come down flat on the forehead, so that a Mohammedan can salaam in prayers without uncovering. A mild-faced, serious, slow-moving people they seemed.

The brisk young Prussian who got on at Adrianople was strikingly different. He wore the uniform of a Bey in the Turkish army, with the tall cap of brown astrakhan ornamented with the gold crescent, and on his breast were the ribbons of the Iron Cross, and the Turkish Order of the Hamidieh. His scarred face was set in a violent scowl, and he strode up and down the corridor, muttering "Gottverdamnte Dummheit!" from time to time. At the first stop he descended, looked sharply around, and barked something in Turkish to the two tattered old railway guards who were scuffling along the platform.

"Tchabouk! Hurry!" he snapped. "Sons of pigs, hurry when I call!"

Startled, they came running at a stiff trot. He looked them up and down with a sneer; then shot a string of vicious words at them. The two old men trotted off and, wheeling, marched stiffly back, trying to achieve the goose-step and salute in Prussian fashion. Again he bawled insultingly in their faces; again, with crestfallen expression, they repeated the manoeuvre. It was ludicrous and pitiable to watch....

"Gott in Himmd!" cried the instructor to the world in general, shaking his fists in the air, "were there ever such animals? Again! Again! Tchabouk! Run, damn you!"

Meanwhile, the other soldiers and the peasants had withdrawn from range, and stood in clusters at a distance, mildly inspecting this amazing human phenomenon.... Of a sudden a little Turkish corporal detached himself from the throng, marched up to the Prussian, saluted, and spoke. The other glared, flushed to his hair, the cords stood out on his neck, and he thrust his nose against the little man's nose, and screamed at him.

"Bey ejfendi—" began the corporal. And "Bey ejfendi—" he tried again to explain. But the Bey went brighter scarlet, grew more offensive, and finally drew back in good old Prussian fashion and slapped him in the face. The Turk winced and then stood quite still, while the red print of a hand sprang out on his cheek, staring without expression straight into the other's eyes. Undefined, scarcely heard, a faint wind of sound swept over all those watching people....

All afternoon we crawled southeast through a blasted land. The low, hot air was heavy, as if with the breath of unnumbered generations of dead; a sluggish haze softened the distance. Thin corn-fields, irregular melon patches, dusty willows around a country well were all the vegetation. Occasionally there was a rustic thrashing-floor, where slow oxen drew round and round over the yellow corn a heavy sledge full of laughing, shouting youngsters. Once a caravan of shambling dromedaries, roped together, crossed our vision, rocking along with great dusty bales slung from their humps—the three small boys who were drivers skylarking about them. No living thing for miles and miles, nor any human evidences except the ruins of old cities, abandoned as the ebbing population withdrew into the city or Asia Minor beyond.... Yet this land has always been empty and desolate as it is to-day; even at the height of the Byzantine Empire, it was good policy to keep a barren waste between the City and the countries of the restless barbarians....

Now we began to pass troop-trains. English submarines in the Sea of Marmora had paralyzed water transport to Gallipoli, and the soldiers went by railroad to Koulcli Bourgas, and then marched overland to Bulair. The freight-car doors were crowded with dark, simple faces; there came to us incessant quavering nasal singing to the syncopated accompaniment of shrill pipes and drums. One was full of savage-eyed Arabs from the desert east of Aleppo, dressed still in sweeping gray and brown burnouses, their thin, intense faces more startling for the encircling folds.

Tchataldja was feverishly active; narrow-gauge little trains loaded with guns, steel trench roofs, piles of tools, puffed off along the folds of the hills, and the naked brown slopes swarmed with a multitude of tiny figures working on trenches against the eventuality of Bulgarian invasion....

The sun set behind, warming for an instant with a wash of gold the desolate leagues on leagues of waste. Night came suddenly, a moonless night of overwhelming stars. We moved slower and slower, waiting interminably on switches while the whining, singing troop-trains flashed by.... Toward midnight I fell asleep, and woke hours later to find one of the Germans shaking me.

"Constantinople," said he.

I could make out the dim shape of a gigantic wall rushing up as we roared through a jagged breach in it. On the right crumbling half-battlements—the Byzantine sea-wall—fell suddenly away, and showed the sea lapping with tiny waves at the railway embankment; the other side was a rank of tall, unpainted wooden houses leaning crazily against each other, over mouths of gloom which were narrow streets, and piling back up the rising hill of the city in chaotic masses of jumbled roofs. Over these suddenly sprang out against the stars the mighty dome of an imperial mosque, minarets that soared immeasurably into the sky like great lances, broken masses of trees on Seraglio Point, with a glimpse of the steep black wall that had buttressed the Acropolis of the Greeks upon its mountain, the vague forms of kiosks, spiked chimneys of the imperial kitchens in a row, and the wide, flat roof of the Old Seraglio palace—Istamboul, the prize of the world.

CONSTANTINOPLE UNDER THE GERMANS AT four hours precisely, Turkish time (or three il minutes past nine a la fraqne), on the morning of chiharshenbi, yigirmi utch of the month of Temoos, year of the Hegira bin utch yuze otouz utch, I woke to an immense lazy roar, woven of incredibly varied noises—the indistinct shuffling of a million slippers, shouts, bellows, high, raucous peddler voices, the nasal wail of a muezzin strangely calling to prayer at this unusual hour, dogs howling, a donkey braying, and, I suppose, a thousand schools in mosque courtyards droning the Koran. From my balcony I looked down on the roofs of tall Greek apartments which clung timorously to the steep skirts of Pera and broke into a dark foam of myriad Turkish houses that rushed across the valley of Kassim Pasha, swirling around the clean white mosque and two minarets, and the wave of close trees they sprang from. The little houses were all wood—rarely with a roof of old red tiles—unpainted, weathered to a dull violet, clustered where the builder's caprice had set them, threaded with a maze of wriggling streets, and spotted with little windows that caught the sun—golden. Beyond the valley they crowded up the hillside, jumbled at every conceivable angle, like a pile of children's blocks—and all of the windows ablaze. Piale Pasha Mosque started up northward, dazzling, its minaret leaping from the very dome—built to look like the mast of a ship by the great Kaptan Pasha, who broke the sea power of Venice in the sixteenth century. Down this valley Mohammed the Conqueror dragged his ships after hauling them over the high ridge where Pera stands, and launched them in the Golden Horn. Shabby Greek San Dimitri to the right; a dark pageant of cypresses along the crest over Kassim Pasha, that bounds the barren field of the Ok-Meidan, whose white stones mark the record shots of great Sultans who were masters of the bow and arrow; the heights of Haskeui, sombre with spacious wooden houses weathered black, where the great Armenian money princes lived in the dangerous days, and where now the Jews spawn in indescribable filth; northward again, over the mighty shoulder of a bald hill, the treeless, thick-clustered field of the Hebrew cemetery, as terrible as a razed city. Bounding all to the west, the Golden Horn curved, narrowing east, around to north, a sheet of molten brass on which were etched black the Sultan's yacht and the yacht of the Khedive of Egypt—with the blue sphinxes painted on her stern—and the steamer General, sleeping quarters of German officers; dismantled second-rate cruisers, the pride of the Turkish navy, long gathering barnacles in the Golden Horn; the little cruiser Hamedieh, swarming with tiny dots, which were German sailors in fezzes; and countless swarms of darting caiks, like water-beetles.

Up from that bath of gold swept Stamboul from her clustering tangle of shanties on piles, rising in a pattern of huddling little roofs too intricate for any eye to follow, to the jagged crest lifting like music along her seven hills, where the great domes of the imperial mosques soared against the sky and flung aloft their spear-like minarets.

I could see the Stamboul end of the Inner Bridge and a little corner of the Port of Commerce, with the tangled jam of ships which were caught there when the war broke out. Above the bridge lay Phanar, where the Patriarch, who still signs himself "Bishop of New Rome," has his palace, for centuries the powerful fountain of life and death for all the millions of "Roum-mileti"; Phanar, refuge of imperial Byzantine families after the fall of the city, home of those merchant princes who astounded Renaissance Europe with their wealth and bad taste; Phanar, for five hundred years centre of the Greek race under the Turk. Farther along Balata—the Palatium of the Romans—and Aivan Serai above it, shadowed in the immense sprawling ruins of Byzantine palaces, where the walls of Manuel Comnenus stagger up from the water and are lost in the city. Beyond, Eyoub, the sacred village of tombs around that dazzling mosque which no Christian may enter, and the interminable mass of cypresses of that holiest of all cemeteries, climbing the steep hill behind. Greek and Roman walls; the spikes of four hundred minarets; mosques that were built with a king's treasure in a burst of vanity by the old magnificent Sultans, others that were Christian churches under the Empress Irene, whose walls are porphyry and alabaster, and whose mosaics, whitewashed over, blaze through in gold and purple splendor; fragments of arches and columns of semiprecious stones, where once the golden statues of emperors stood—and marching splendidly across the sky-line of the city the double-arches of the tree-crowned aqueduct.

The hotel porter was a clever Italian with a nose for tips. He bent over me deferentially as I breakfasted, rubbing his hands.

"Excellency," he said in French, "the secret police have been here to inquire about your Excellency. Would your Excellency like me to tell them any particular thing...?"

Daoud Bey was waiting for me, and together we went out into Tramway Street, where the electric cars clang past, newsboys shout the late editions of the newspapers written in French—and apartment-houses, curiosity-shops, cafes, banks, and embassies look like a shabby quarter in an Italian city. Here every one, men and women, wore European clothes, just a trifle off in fashion, fit, and cloth—like "store clothes" bought on Third Avenue. It was a crowd of no nations and of all bloods, clever, facile, unscrupulous, shallow—Levantine. At the gates of the few open embassies sat the conventional Montenegrin doorkeepers, in savage panoply of wide trousers and little jackets, and enormous sashes stuck full of pistols; kavases of consulates and legations slouched around the doors of diplomats, in uniforms covered with gold lace, fezzes with arms blazing on them, and swords. An occasional smart carriage went by, with driver and footmen wearing the barbaric livery of the diplomatic service. Yet turn into any street off the Grand Rue or the Rue des Tramways, and the tall overhanging buildings echoed with appeals of half-naked ladies leaning callously from windows all the way up to the fourth floor. In those narrow, twisting alleys the fakers and the thieves and the vicious and unfit of the Christian Orient crowded and shouted and passed; filth was underfoot, pots of ambiguous liquids rained carelessly down, and the smells were varied and interesting. Miles and miles of such streets, whole quarters given over to a kind of weak debauch; and fronting the cultivated gentlemen and delicate ladies of the European colony only the bold front of the shell of hotels and clubs and embassies.

It was the day after Warsaw fell into German hands. Yesterday the German places had hoisted the German and Turkish flags to celebrate the event. As we walked down the steep street, that with the mercilessness of modern civilization cuts an ancient Turkish cemetery in half so the street-cars may pass, Daoud Bey related interesting details of what followed.

"The Turkish police went around," said he with some gusto, "and ordered the German flags pulled down. We had the devil of a row, for the German embassy made a strong complaint."

"Why did you do that? Aren't you allies?"

He looked at me sideways and smiled mockingly. "No one is more fond than I of our Teutonic brothers (for you know the Germans let our people think they are Mohammedans). According to the German idea, perhaps the taking of Warsaw was also a Turkish victory. But we are getting touchy about the spread of German flags in the city."

I noticed that many shops and hotels had signs newly painted in French, but that on most of them the European languages had been eliminated.

"You will be amused by that," said Daoud Bey. "You see, when the war broke out, the government issued an order that no one in Turkey should use the language of a hostile nation. The French newspapers were suppressed, the French and English signs ordered removed; people were forbidden to speak French, English, or Russian; and letters written in the three languages were simply burned. But they soon found out that the greater part of the population on this side of the Golden Horn speak only French, and no Turkish at all; so they had to let up. As for letters, that was simple. The American consul protested; so just a week ago the papers printed a solemn order of the government that, although French, English, and Russian were still barred, you might write letters in American!"

Daoud Bey was a Turk of wealthy, prominent family—which is extraordinary in Turkey, where families rise and fall in one generation, and there is no family tradition because there is no family name. Daoud, son of Hamid, was all we knew him by; just as I, to the Turkish police, was known as John, son of Charles. In that splendid idle way Turks have, Daoud had been made an admiral in the navy at the age of nineteen. Some years later a British naval commission, by invitation, reorganized the Turkish fleet. Now, it is difficult to pry wealthy young Turks loose from their jobs. The commission therefore asked Daoud Bey very politely if he would like to continue being an admiral. He answered: "I should like to very much, provided I never have to set foot on a ship. I can't bear the sea." So he is no longer in the navy.

I asked him why he was not bleeding and dying with his compatriots in the trenches at Gallipoli.

"Of course," said he, "you Westerners cannot be expected to understand. Here you buy out of military service by paying forty liras. If you don't buy out it amounts to the admission that you haven't forty liras—which is very humiliating. No Turk of any prominence could afford to be seen in the army, unless, of course, he entered the upper official grades as a career. Why, my dear fellow, if I were to serve in this war the disgrace would kill my father. It is quite different from your country. Here the recruiting sergeants beg you to pay your exemption fee—and they jeer at you if you haven't got it!"

At the foot of the hill there is a tangle of meeting streets—Step Street, that used to be the only way to clamber up to Pera; the wriggling narrow alleys that squirm through a Greek quarter of tall, dirty houses to infamous Five-Piastre and Ten-Piastre Streets in the vicious sailor town of Galata; the one street that leads to the cable tunnel, where the cars climb underground to the top of the hill—all opening into the square of Kara-keuy before the Valideh Sultan Keuprissi, the far-famed Outer Bridge that leads to Stamboul. White-frocked toll-collectors stood there in rippling rank, closing and parting before the throng, to the rattling chink of ten-paras pieces falling into their outstretched hands. And flowing between them like an unending torrent between swaying piles, poured that bubbling ferment of all races and all religions—from Pera to Stamboul, and from Stamboul to Pera. Floating silk Arab head-dresses, helmets, turbans of yellow and red, smart fezzes, fezzes with green turbans around them to mark the relative of the Prophet, fezzes with white turbans around them—priests and teachers—Persian iarbouches, French hats, panamas. Veiled women in whose faces no man looked, hurrying along in little groups, robed in tcharchafs of black and gray and light brown, wearing extravagantly high-heeled French slippers too big for their feet, and followed by an old black female slave; Arabs from the Syrian desert in floating white cloaks; a saint from the country, bearded to the eyes, with squares of flesh showing through his colored rags, striding along, muttering prayers, with turban all agog, while a little crowd of disciples pressed after to kiss his hand and whine a blessing; bare-legged Armenian porters staggering at a smooth trot, bent under great packing-cases and shouting "Destour!" to clear the way; four soldiers on foot with new rifles; helmeted police on horseback; shambling eunuchs in frock coats; a Bulgarian bishop; three Albanians in blue broadcloth trousers and jackets embroidered with silver; two Catholic Sisters of Charity walking at the head of their little donkey-cart, presented to them by the Mohammedan merchants of the Great Bazaar; a mevlevi, or dancing dervish, in tall conical felt hat and gray robes; a bunch of German tourists in Tyrolean hats, equipped with open Baedekers, and led by a plausible Armenian guide; and representatives of five hundred fragments of strange races, left behind by the great invasions of antiquity in the holes and corners of Asia Minor. Pera is European—Greek, Armenian, Italian—anything but Turkish. Where goes this exotic crowd that pours into Pera? You never see them there.

A thousand vendors of the most extraordinary merchandise—Angora honey, helva, loukoum of roses, kaymak (made from the milk of buffaloes shut in a dark stable), obscene postal cards, cigarette-holders of German glass, Adrianople melons, safety-pins, carpets manufactured in Newark, New Jersey, celluloid beads—moved among the crowd shouting their wares, bellowing, whining, screaming: "Only a cent, two cents—On paras, bech paraya."

To the right lay the Port of Commerce, crowded with ships, and the Inner Bridge beyond, all up the splendid sweep of Golden Horn. Outside the bridge was a row of pontoons placed there to guard the port from English submarines, and against the barrier the chirkel haries—Bosphorus steamboats—backing precipitously out with screaming whistles into the thick flock of caiks that scatter like a shoal of fish. Beyond, across the bright-blue dancing water, the coast of Asia rising faintly into mountains, with Scutari dotted white along the shore. Stamboul, plunging from that magnificent point, crowned with palaces and trees, into the sea.... From left to right the prodigious sweep of the city, and the great mosques: Agia Sophia, built by the Emperor Justinian a thousand years ago, all clumsy great buttresses of faded red and yellow; the Mosque of Sultan Selim, who conquered Mecca; the Mosque of Sultan Achmet; Yeni Valideh Djami, at the end of the bridge; Sultan Suleyman the Magnificent—he who was a friend of Francois Premier; Sultan Bayazid....

The floating drawbridge swung slowly open with much confused shouting and the tugging of cables by sputtering launches to allow the passage of a German submarine coming up from the Dardanelles. She was awash, her conning-tower painted a vivid blue with white streaks—the color most disguising in these bright seas; but a momentary cloud passed over the sun, and she stood out startling against the suddenly gray water.

"It takes them about an hour to close the bridge," said Daoud Bey, and drew me into an alley between stone buildings, where little tables and stools hugged the shade of the wall, and a shabby old Turk in flapping slippers and a spotted fez served ices. Outside all roar and clamor, and hot sun beating on the pavement—here cool, quiet peace.

"Daoud Pasha!" said a laughing voice. It was a slender girl in a faded green feridji, with bare brown feet, and a shawl pinned under her chin, in the manner of the very poor, who cannot afford a veil. She could not have been more than fifteen; her skin was golden, and her black eyes flashed mischievously.

"Eli!" cried Daoud, seizing her hand.

"Give me some money!" said Eli imperiously.

"I have no small money."

"All right, then, give me big money."

Daoud laughed and handed her a medjidieh—and she gave a scream of pleasure, clapped her hands, and was gone.

"Gypsy," said Daoud, "and the most beautiful girl in all Constantinople. Hamdi, a friend of mine, fell in love with her, and asked her into his harem. So she went to live at Eyoub. But two weeks later I came down here one day, and as I was taking my sherbet I heard a little voice at my elbow: 'Daoud Pasha, some money please.' It was Eli. She said she had tried to be a respectable married lady for fourteen days, because she really loved Hamdi. He was very kind to her—gave her clothes and jewels, and courted her like a lover. But she couldn't stand it any longer; begging on the streets was more fun—she loved the crowd so. So one night she let herself out of the harem door and swam across the Golden Horn!" He laughed and shrugged his shoulders: "You can't tame a chingani!"

We paid. "May God favor you!" the proprietor said gently, and a Turk sitting at our table bowed and mumbled: "Afiyet-olsoun! May what you have eaten do you good!"

Outside on the wharf where the calks were ranked, each boatman yelling as loud as he could, a blind old woman in rusty black crouched against the wall and held out her hand. Daoud dropped a copper in it. She raised her sightless eyes to us and said in a sweet voice: "Depart smiling." "Koch par aval How much?" said Daoud. A deafening clamor of voices shouted indistinguishable things.

"Let us take the old man," said my friend, pointing to a figure with a long white beard, burnt-orange skull-cap, red sash, and pink shirt open at the throat to show his hairy old chest. "How much, effendim?" He used the term of respect which all Turks use toward each other,

no matter what the difference in their ranks.

"Five piastres," said the old man hopefully.

"I pay one piastre and a half," answered Daoud, climbing into the ca'ik. Without reply the caikji pushed off.

"What is your name, my father?" asked Daoud.

"My name is Abdul, my son," said the old man, rowing and sweating in the sun. "I am born of Mohammed the Short-legged in the city of Trebizond on the sea. For fifty-two years I have been rowing my ca'ik across the Stamboul Limani."

I told Daoud to ask him what he thought of the war.

"It is a good war," said Abdul. "All wars against the giaour are good, for does not the Koran say that he who dies slaying the infidel will enter paradise?"

"You are learned in the Koran?" exclaimed Daoud. "Perhaps, you are a sheikh and lead prayers in the mosque."

"Do I wear the white turban?" said the old man. "I am no priest; but in my youth I was a muezzin, and called to prayers from the minaret."

"What should he know of the war?" I said. "It doesn't touch him personally."

Daoud translated.

"I have four sons and two grandsons in the war," said Abdul, with dignity. Then to me: "Are you an Aleman—a German—one of our brothers who do not know our language and do not wear the fez? Tell me, of what shape and build are your mosques? Is your Sultan as great as our Sultan?"

I replied evasively that he was very great.

"We shall win this war, inshaUah—God willing," said Abdul.

"Mashallah I" responded Daoud gravely, and I saw that his light European cynicism was a thin veneer over eight centuries of deep religious belief. THE HEART OF STAMBOUL OUR calk ran into a thick tangle of calks clamorous with shouting, arguing boatmen, Abdul standing upright and screaming: "Var-dah! Make way, sons of animals! Make way for the passengers! You have no passengers, why do you block the landing-place?" We laid our piastre and a half on the thwart and leaped ashore in Stamboul. Through the narrow, winding street piled high with melons and vegetables and water-casks, and overhung by ragged awnings propped on sticks, we jostled an amazing crowd of porters, mullahs, merchants, pilgrims, and peddlers. In the Oriental way, no one moved from our road—we bumped along.

Along a cross street a string of boys and young men—each one carrying a loaf of bread—marched by between double lines of soldiers.

"Recruits," said Daoud Bey. Often we met a non-commissioned officer and two armed men prowling among the crowds, glancing sharply in the faces of the young men; they were looking for possible soldiers who had not yet been called. Shouts and the trampling of feet, angry bellows and screams of pain drew our attention to a side alley, where a hundred men and women of all races swirled against the front of a shop; fez tassels danced in the air, grasping hands leaped out and sank, choking voices yelled, and on the outskirts two policemen beat any back they could reach — thwack! thwack!

"Waiting to buy bread," explained Daoud. "Hundreds of places like that all over Constantinople. There's plenty of grain in Anatolia, but the army needs the freight-cars—so they say."

I said it ought to be an easy matter to feed the city.

"Possibly," he answered with ironical inflection. "Have you heard the rumor that the city officials are holding back the supply so as to get higher prices? Base falsehood, of course—yet such things have happened before. And then our German brothers are more or less responsible. They persuaded our government to take a census of the city—a thing which has never before been possible since the fifteenth century. But trust the Germans to find a way. The government took over the bakeries and closed them for three days, while it was announced that every one must apply for a bread-ticket in order to buy bread. By slow degrees they are getting us all registered—for a man must eat. Last evening, in the back streets of Pera, I came upon a bakery where the last loaf had just been distributed, with a howling mob outside still unprovided for. First they smashed the windows, in spite of the clubbing of the police, and then they began to tear down the Turkish flags hung out on all the houses to celebrate the fall of Novo-Geo gievska, crying: 'We don't care for victories! Give us bread!'"

We sat cross-legged in the booth of Youssof Effendi the Hoja, in the Misr Tcharshee, or Bazaar of Egypt, where drugs are sold. Dim light filtered through cobweb windows high up in the arched roof that covered in the bazaar—making a cool gloom rich with the smells of perfumes, drugs, herbs, and strange Oriental medicines, of coffee from Aden, of tea from southern Persia. Overhead the whitewashed arch was scrawled with immense black whorls and loops of prayers to Allah, and Esculapian snakes twisted into verses out of the Koran. Above the booth was an intricate cornice of carved wood, covered with spiderwebs, and from this vague twilight depended all sorts of strange objects on chains: dervish beggar-bowls made from the brittle skin of sea animals, ostrich eggs, tortoise-shells, two human skulls, and what was evidently the lower jaw of a horse. On the counter and the shelves behind were crowded glass bottles and earthen pots full of crude amber, lumps of camphor, hashish in powder and in the block, Indian and Chinese opium and the weak opium of Anatolia, bunches of dried herbs to cure the plague, black powder for love philters, crystals of oil for aphrodisiacs, charms to avert the evil eye and to confound your enemies, attar of roses, blocks of sandalwood, and sandal oil. In the dark little room behind the shop were heaped bales and jars, so that when Youssof Effendi lighted his lamp it looked and smelled like the cave of the Forty Thieves.

He stopped us, bowing, with the right hand sweeping down, and fluttering to lips and forehead again and again; a tall, dignified figure in a long caftan of gray silk, and fez with the white turban of a religious teacher wound about it—immaculate. A glossy black beard covered his powerful mouth and dazzling teeth, and he had dark, shrewd, kindly eyes.

"Salaam aleykoun, Daoud Bey," said he softly. "Peace be with you." "Aleykoun salaam, Youssof Effendi," answered Daoud, rapidly making the gesture and touching lips and forehead. "Here is my friend from America." "Hosh geldin. You are welcome," said the Hoja courteously to me, with a constant motion of his hands to lips and forehead. He didn't say "salaam" which is only used between Mohammedans. The Hoja knew only Turkish.

"Bedri!" he cried and clapped his hands, and a little boy scurried out from somewhere in the bowels of the shop. "Coffee, haidel ..."

We sat sipping the sweet thick liquid, smoking in long wooden chibouks cigarettes that we rolled of choice tobacco from Samsoun, in the cool, fragrant gloom.

"Is the ejjendim well?" murmured the Hoja gently, in the ritual of Oriental politeness; each sip we took, each puff at our cigarettes he touched his lips and forehead, and we to him. "May God make it pleasant to your stomachs."

The Hoja was a powerful man in Stamboul. For twenty years he had been muezzin in the mosque of Zeirick Kilissi, which was once the church of St. Saviour Pantocrator, and in whose shadow still lies the verde antique sarcophagus of the Empress Irene; then a leader of prayers on Friday in the great mosques; a popular teacher and charm doctor; and finally sent for by Abdul Hamid to lead private prayers in Yildiz Kiosk, those long years the Sultan shut himself up there in fear of assassination.

"I know many fables about the marvels of America," said Youssof Effendi graciously. "There appear to be palaces taller than those raised by the djinni in ancient times, and I have heard there is a demon called Graft"—here his eyes twinkled—"who stalks through your streets and devours people, and is known in no other land. One day I shall go there, for I understand that there opium is worth its weight in gold."

He looked from Daoud Bey to me. "You are different from us, you races of the West," he remarked. "Daoud Bey is handsome, but he is over-refined and thinks too much. He will have nervous jumps some day. He should not smoke tobacco, but eat plenty of eggs and milk. Tell the American effendi that I think he does not think too much and is very happy. That is the way I am."

I wanted Daoud to ask how many wives he had. The Hoja understood my ill-mannered curiosity and smiled.

"Pekkil How many wives has the effendi?" he replied. "Does he think that it is any easier for a Mohammedan to support two wives than a Christian? Allah preserve us! Women are expensive. I know but six friends who have more than one wife. When the Armenian slave dealers come by m'ght to my harem from Scutari with a fair odalik to sell, I answer them with a proverb: 'How many bodies can live of one man's meat?'"

"What does Youssof Effendi think of the war?"

"The war?" he answered, and the evasive look on his face showed that I had touched on a subject in which he was deeply involved. "My son is in the trenches at Gallipoli. Allah send what he will! One does not think of whether wars are good or bad. We are a fighting race, we Osmanlis."

"Do the Turks—" I began.

The Hoja interrupted me with a sputtering torrent of language.

"You must not call us 'Turks,'" said Daoud. "'Turk' means rustic clown—'rube,' as you would say. We are not Turcomans, barbaric, bloodthirsty savages from Central Asia; we are Osmanlis, an ancient and civilized race."

The Hoja talked frankly of the Germans. "I do not like them," he said. "They have no manners. When an Englishman or an American has been one month in Turkey, he comes to my booth with hand to lips, to forehead, and greets me: 'Sabah sherifiniz hair ola.' Before he buys, he accepts my coffee and my cigarettes, and we talk of indifferent subjects, as is proper. But when the Germans come they salute as they do in their army, and refuse my coffee, and want to buy and be gone, without friendship. I do not sell any more to Alemanes."

Later I observed many of the Germans around the city; there were hundreds of them—officers on leave, tourists, and civil officials. Often they violated the delicate etiquette that governs Mohammedan life. They spoke to veiled women on the street; bullied merchants in the Great Bazaar; stamped noisily into mosques during the hour of prayer on Friday, when no European is allowed to enter, and once at a tekkeh of the Howling Dervishes I was present in the visitors' gallery, while two German officers read aloud passages from the Koran in German throughout the services—to the furious indignation of the priests....

We went up with Youssof Effendi through the intricate winding streets of Stamboul, plunging into passages lined with tiny Armenian shops, under the walls of the fortress-like khans built for the entertainment of strangers by the mothers of bygone Sultans, by secret paths across the quiet courtyards of the great mosques, where children played about delicately carved marble fountains in the shade of enormous ancient trees; down little streets that twisted between the wooden booths of the seal-makers and sellers of tesbiehs—bead-chains—where green vines fell like cascades from the roofs; into vast sun-smitten dusty squares, the site of Byzantine forums and of coliseums greater than Rome's; through winding alleys of wooden houses with overhanging shahnichars, where there was only an occasional passer-by—a shrillvoiced peddler beating his donkey, a grave-faced imam, women hurrying along with averted faces.

When we passed women Daoud began to talk German in a loud voice.

"They think you are a German officer," he said, laughing, "and it makes a terrible hit. All the harems are learning German now, and a lieutenant from Berlin or Hanover is the romantic ideal of most Turkish women!"

Half the people we met saluted the Hoja—saluted him humbly as a person of prominence and power. In the unending maze of covered streets which makes up the Great Bazaar, a double chorus of cries came from both sides: "Youssof Effendi, buy of me! See this beautiful chibouk! Honor me with your patronage, Youssof Effendi!" In the Bechistan, that gloomy great square where are the jewels and precious metals, the gold-and-silver-inlaid weapons and ancient carpets, we moved from counter to counter in triumph, followed by the sheikh of the Bechistan himself.

"What is the price of this?" asked the Hoja imperiously.

"A Turkish pound, effendim"

"Robber and thief," replied our guide calmly. "I will give you five piastres." He moved on, flinging back over his shoulder: "Dog of a Jew, we go and return no more!"

"Ten piastres! Ten piastres!" screamed the man, while the sheikh berated him for his discourtesy to the great Youssof Effendi....

For me he beat down a nervous shouting salesman on an amber chibouk, from two and a half pounds to twenty piastres.

"Do not make me shout, Youssof Effendi!" he yelled, his voice breaking, and the sweat standing out on his brow. "You will give me apoplexy!"

"Twenty piastres," said the Hoja calmly, inexorably.

Late in the morning we sat in the dark cubbyhole behind a little Greek bookshop near the Sublime Porte, looking at hand-illuminated Korans—Daoud Bey, myself, and the clever, pleasant proprietor. Enter a young policeman, in gray coat with red epaulets and a fez of gray astrakhan. He came to where we sat, sighed deeply, and began in a melancholy voice a long story in Turkish. Daoud translated.

"I have eaten ofal," said the policeman. "I have been greatly humiliated. Several days ago I observed Ferid Bey and Mahmoud Bey sitting in a cafe" talking to an unveiled girl of the streets, who was a Greek. Ferid Bey came to me and said: 'You must arrest Mahmoud

Bey.' 'Why for?' I asked. 'Because he is talking piggishness to a girl.' I was very much surprised. 'I did not know that talking piggishness to a girl was against the law,' I said. 'I am a friend of Bedri Bey, the chief of police,' said Ferid Bey, 'and I demand that you arrest Mahmoud Bey for talking piggishness to that girl.' So I arrested Mahmoud Bey and took him to jail.

"He was in prison for three days, because everybody had forgotten all about him; but at last the keeper of the jail telephoned Bedri Bey, and asked what to do with Mahmoud Bey. Bedri Bey replied that he knew nothing of the man or the matter, so why keep him in prison? Therefore, they let Mahmoud Bey loose, and he telephoned at once to Bedri Bey, and made a complaint about being arrested. 'Talking piggishness,' said he, 'is no offense against the law.' Then Bedri Bey called me before him and applied epithets to me, like 'son of an animal,' and threatened to dismiss me. Together Mahmoud Bey and I went to arrest Ferid Bey. But he was gone, he and the girl together. Then Mahmoud Bey boxed my ears. I am humiliated. I have eaten of fall."

We dined in the restaurant of the Municipal Garden of the Petit Champs at Pera, to the blaring rag-time of the band. The striped awning over the terrace was gay in a flood of yellow light, and electriclamps hanging high in the full-leaved trees made a dim, checkered shade on the people sitting drinking at iron tables, and the cosmopolitan moved round and round the garden. Vague under the smoky radiance of an immense yellow moon, the Golden Horn glittered, speckled with the red and green lights of ships; beyond lay the dim, obscure mass of Stamboul, like a crouching animal.

The diners were mostly Germans and Austrians—officers on leave, aide-de-camps on duty at the Seraskierat in full-dress Turkish uniform, civilian officials, and the highly paid workmen of the Krupp factories; many of them with wives and children, in comfortable bourgeois dinner-parties like the restaurants of Berlin. But there were also Frenchmen with smartly dressed wives, English, Italians, and Americans. In the slowly moving throng outside under the trees, were Perote Greeks, Armenians, Levantine Italians, Turks of official rank; German submarine sailors, Germans of the Turkish navy in fezzes, and great rolling ruddy American sailors from the stationnaire Scorpion, towering in their white summer uniform head and shoulders above the crowd. It was hard to believe that, just beyond the reach of our ears, the great guns spat and boomed unceasingly day and night across the bitter sands of Gallipoli....

If I had only space to recount the Homeric battles of those American sailors! The German man-of-war's-men and soldiers were friendly, but the workmen and civilians very quarrelsome. Sometimes an intoxicated or excited Teuton would come over to the American table and begin an argument about munitions of war, or the Lusitania case; or a German officer in Turkish uniform would stop them on the street and insist on being saluted. The sailors answered nothing but insults, and then they answered with their fists, Anglo-Saxon fashion. I could write another article simply about the night that Seaman Williams broke the German lieutenant's head with a stone beer-mug, and was transferred back to the United States as being "unfit for diplomatic service." And then there is the wonderful history of the two sailors who laid out seventeen attacking Germans in a cafe", and were led back to the American Sailors' Club by congratulatory police, while the wounded foe were jailed for three days. ... Respect and friendship was mutual between the American sailors and the Turkish police....

Afterward we got into a cab and drove down the steep, dark streets to the Inner Bridge; the cabman carefully shrouded his lamps, for lights on the bridges were forbidden on account of possible lurking British submarines. Stamboul was black—they were saving coal. Dim lamps in the interiors of little stores and cafes shed a flickering illumination on mysterious figures shrouded in the voluminous garments of the East, who drifted silently by on slippered feet.

Youssof Effendi was in his favorite cafe in a street behind the Bayazid mosque. We sat there with him, talking and drinking coffee, and puffing lazily at our narghilehs—the gray, cool smoke it makes the sweat stand out on your forehead.... Later we walked through the darkness across the city, by ways known to him alone, through arched passages, broken walls, and mosque courtyards. One after the other on mighty minarets, the muezzins came out into the heavy night, and cried that quavering singsong which carries so far, and seems the last requiem of an old religion and a worn-out race.

Out of his great courtesy, the Hoja insisted on going with us to Pera; so we invited him to drink a coffee with us at the Petit Champs. On the open-air stage the regular evening vaudeville performance was going on—singing girls, dancing girls, American tramp comedian, Hungarian acrobats, German marionettes—the harsh voices, lascivious gestures, suggestive costumes, ungraceful writhings of the Occident. How vulgar it seemed after the dignified quiet of Stamboul, the exquisite courtesy of Turkish life!

Some Turkish officers from the interior of Asia Minor, who had never before seen women publicly unveiled and showing their legs, sat gaping in the front row, alternately flushing with anger and shame and roaring with laughter at the amazing indecency of the civilized West.... The Hoja watched the performance attentively, but his polished politeness gave no sign of embarrassment. Soon it ended, and in spite of many protests on the Hoja's part, we walked down the hill to the bridge with him. He did not speak of the show at all. But I was curious to know his real opinion.

"It was very lovely," replied Youssof Effendi with the most suave courtesy: "I shall take my little granddaughter to see it...."

Down at the dark bridge the draw was open, to let pass a contraband ship full of coal and oil which had crept down the coast from Burgas. Now at night it is forbidden for all but high officers to cross the Golden Horn in caïks, so there seemed nothing to do but wait for the interminable closing of the draw. Daoud Bey, however, confidently led the way down to the landing-place. Suddenly, out of the shadow popped a soldier-patrol.

"Dour! Stop!" cried the officer. "Where are you going?"

Daoud turned on him rudely. "Wir sind Deutsche pfifizieren!" he bellowed. The man saluted hastily, and fell back into the dark. "The German always does it," chuckled Daoud....

Late at night we climbed once more up Pera Hill. In a dark side-street the crowd was already beginning to gather about the front of a bakery, to stand there until it opened in the morning. We were stopped at Tramway Street by a flock of tooting automobiles rushing up, and street-cars one after another with clanging bells. Through the dark windows we glimpsed white faces staring out, bandaged—another O cent ship had arrived from the front, and they were hurrying the wounded to the hospitals.

AN INTERVIEW WITH A PRINCE SUNDAY we took the chirket-harie to Kadi-keuy across the Bosphorus, to call upon Achmet Effendi, Prince of the Imperial blood—a son of Abdul Hamid, and seventh in line for the Sultanate. In Turkey the eldest member of the reigning family succeeds; accordingly, it is not very long since each Sultan, on coming to the throne, strangled as a matter of course his cousins, brothers, and uncles, and imprisoned all his sons except the Crown Prince—until the latter himself reached the Caliphate, and released his brothers by poisoned coffee or the cord. In Prince Achmet's time family murder as a royal pastime had gone out, but imprisonment of sons was still in vogue. And for more than twenty years he was immured in a wing of the Palace of Dolmabahceh on the Bosphorus—shut there with his women and his slaves, no visitors allowed to see him, no newspapers to reach him, no breath of life nor any whisper of the outside world to quicken the sluggish air of the harem. When the revolution of the Young Turks overturned his father, he was set free—a fat, pasty little figure who had hardly learned to read and write, bewildered and lost in the tremendous swirl of modern life.

He lived in the abandoned villa of an Englishman who had fled from Moda at the outbreak of the war. At the ring of the door-bell, a black grinning eunuch in shabby frock coat bowed low to Daoud Bey, and led us into the hideous mid-Victorian parlor; satin-ribbed brown wall-paper, black-walnut furniture upholstered in brilliant blue plush, a horrible watercolor of Dover Cliff on an easel, and flowering ferns in a wooden model of a caïk. That was funny and pathetic enough—the attempt of that exiled family to make for itself a background of home. But the prince had added his own belongings; cheap wooden taborets inlaid with mother-of-pearl, a rosewood Morris chair of art nouveau design with green-velvet cushions, and a number of rugs of slovenly make, of the most screaming cheap German colors. He asked us later to admire these; and confided to Daoud that he had sold the fivecentury old Chinese and Persian rugs which had carpeted his palace-prison, and bought these brighter, better ones.

It was a long and elaborate ritual. First the eunuch carried word up-stairs that we wished to see his Highness. Then a sort of butler, with hand fluttering to lips and forehead, salaamed us into chairs. He disappeared, and there were vague sounds of disturbance aloft. Fifteen minutes later the eunuch returned; his Highness would see us. A long wait. The majordomo, a tall, bearded man with an Adam's apple sticking out over his tight Prince Albert, entered smiling, bowing, saluting, with murmurs of "Salaam aleykoun, salaam effendim—" He dapped his hands, and coffee and cigarettes appeared on a little tray, the coffee in little cups so hideously daubed with sticky colors that I doubted my eyes.

"Painted by his Highness with colored inks," said the majordomo proudly.

"His Highness also does landscape." Whereupon, he led us about the room and exhibited a dozen smears on pieces of isinglass, the kind of picture a very young child makes with his first box of colors....

We stood up, sat down, saluted, rose again, accompanying every sip of coffee with flowery compliments. At the end of this, the cups were removed and the majordomo bowed himself out with hands folded across his stomach. Daoud whispered to me not to cross my legs, as that was the height of Turkish bad manners.

Twenty minutes. A eunuch appeared and summoned us to follow, and we went out into the garden behind the house, to a little nook which the prince had made for himself with potted plants and cane chairs. There the majordomo rejoined us with more bowings and compliments. Fifteen minutes. A distant handclap; out of the shrubbery two eunuchs leaped and stood beside the path; the majordomo jumped as if he had been shot, and hurried down the path to meet his royal master. And Achmet Effendi hove in sight.

He was a dumpy, bloated little man with a pale, mottled face under his fez. A stiff, tiny mustache stood straight out on his upper lip. He wore a gray, cut-away suit, a high, stiff collar, gray-silk Ascot tie with a horseshoe pin of blue glass stuck into it, and his fat feet were crammed into patent-leather shoes with violet-cloth tops, laced with yellow-silk ribbon. His mouth twitched nervously, and as he came up to where we were respectfully standing, he twisted his fingers in each other. He touched lips and forehead rapidly a few times, held out a hand as if to shake mine Western fashion, thought better of it and snatched it back—and sat down gingerly on the edge of a chair. We also sat down; he rose again quickly, making us rise, and tried another chair. Then he glanced at us suspiciously, swiftly, and fixed his glance over our heads.

Daoud gave the customary salutations, to which his Highness responded in what Daoud said was illiterate Turkish.

"I have brought my friend John, son of Charles, an American newspaper correspondent, to pay his humble respects to your Highness," said Daoud.

"I never talk to reporters!" snapped Prince Achmet suddenly; and then realizing he had said an ungracious thing, flushed miserably, and followed it up: "I am greatly honored by his visit and yours. I am very fond of foreigners. Last year I tried to learn English, for I admire the English very much. But I could not make my brain concentrate. He turned suddenly in my direction. "Pmutej said he. I looked at Daoud Bey to translate. was making extraordinary signs behind th back. "Peoutefa di I Peoutefa di! Peoutefa di!" cried Achmet Effendi in an agonized voice.

"His Highness is saying that it is a 'beautiful day,' in English, you fool!" murmured Daoud. The prince colored with anger, Daoud glared, I was prostrated. Ten minutes of strained silence.

"The prince wants to know what New York is like," Daoud interpreted.

I told of subways, elevated railroads, great crowds of people hurrying along narrow straight defiles, where the sun shone only an hour each day, so tall were the great buildings that hemmed them in—twenty stories, thirty stories, forty stories.... As I enumerated these, the prince let his eyes travel up into the sky, mouth open, trying to realize my description. He gave it up, shook his head, and smiled. A dearth of conversation prevailed. The prince fidgeted, twisted his fingers.

"You being a correspondent," he said finally, with a kind of nervous sarcasm, "perhaps can tell us some news."

"Your Highness should know," I answered, "that in this war no one knows less news than a correspondent.... But your Highness is an Osmanli of high rank in the councils of state. Your Highness should be able to tell us some news"

"What?" he interrupted haughtily, angrily: "You dare ask me that on our first day's acquaintance? You must know me for at least two years before you can put questions to me!" Again he was miserably embarrassed, ashamed of his petty, nervous suspicion. "I know nothing of the war," he added desolately: "I am not in the councils of state." Poor helpless forlorn creature; hating the cruel world that had attacked his country, hating the Turks because they had ruined, deposed, imprisoned, and perhaps murdered his father.... Of no importance, with no resources, unable to study mathematics or learn to run an automobile—both of which he had tried—moving vacantly and restlessly around his little universe, and longing for some contact with the world of men—a Prince of the Empire!

I have been to Selamlık and seen the whitebearded, weakly-smiling, doddering old Sultan issue from Yildiz to go to prayers, with Enver Pasha, the real ruler of Turkey, by his side—the thirty-three-year-old minister of war who was once a street peddler—while the great dignitaries of the empire ran beside the carriage, and the gorgeous red-coated imperial guards shouted, "Padishah'm tchok yasha!" I have wandered in the vast grimy corridors of the Seraskierat, the war ministry, and furtively inspected the packing-cases still standing in the corridors; three times have the papers and valuables of the ministry been packed for instant flight, when the rumors of English victory at the Dardanelles ran about the city like wildfire.... In unsuspected attics and cellars I have interviewed Armenians who have hidden there for five months or more to escape "deportation"—which means certain death in the deserts of Asia Minor. From the windows of the American Sailors' Club I've hailed the English prisoners as they were marched past—thin, exhausted, sick scarecrows of men, eyes sunken with failure and the sight of too much vain bloodshed. High Turkish officials have told me privately of their smoldering hatred for the Germans, their naive conviction that after the war the Germans shall withdraw, leaving "Turkey to the Turks...."

"We do not hate the Christians," said Youssof Effendi. "We hate only evil people. There are good Christians and bad Christians, just as there are good Osmanlis and bad Osmanlis; but many bad Christians seem to come to Turkey. In the bazaar to-day, you asked if a string of beads was real amber; the Armenian merchant said it was, but I knew it was not. A Turk would not be like that. Armenians and Greeks charge you four times the real price for things, because they see you are a foreigner; a Turk charges the same to foreigners as to Turks, and expects bargaining. The bad women of Pera and Galata are all Christians; there are no Turkish prostitutes.

"Missionaries? The missionaries don't ask us whether we want them to come here, and force Western ideas upon us. We have seen how your people live in Pera, and it doesn't seem much better than our way of living. Your Christ teaches that love and kindness and mercy are better than brute force, and yet all that you have which is better than we have is powerful armies...! Jesus was a great prophet—we pray to him in our mosques. But he was no more the Son of God than Mahomet was the Son of God. We think your religion is blasphemy; but we do not try to change your religion. Yet you try to convert us to a faith that we consider inferior to ours. If Christians would only let us alone, we wouldn't massacre the Armenians...."

A rich Armenian who lived at Buyukdere on the Bosphorus went deeper.

"I agree thoroughly with the Turks," he remarked. "If I were a Turk I should hate the Christians. Turkey is not, cannot be a political state; it is a theocracy, and the only organic law is the Mohammedan religion. Therefore, all Turkish subjects who are not Moslems are necessarily outside the law, and a source of constant trouble. The Turk is absolutely honest in business dealings—his religion makes him so; but we Christians lie and cheat with a clear conscience. No Moslem can exact interest—the Koran forbids it. So as a natural consequence all trade, banking—in fact economic power of every sort, is in the hands of Christian or Jewish foreigners, with whom the Turks' religion will not allow them to compete.

From the Turkish point of view, there is only one solution—all people except Mohammedans must be driven from the empire.... I myself would be deported if I didn't mind my own business and play fair with the Turk. I only cheat foreigners.

"And yet they are so simple, so child-like in this mature world of cutthroats and adventurers, that they think they will get rid of the Germans, too, after the war! You and I know better. It is the end of the Turkish Empire—yes, it is the end, whichever side wins...."

V THE BURNING BALKANS RUMANIA IN DIFFICULTIES MY window, high up in the dazzling neo-French facade of the Athene Palace Hotel in Bucarest, looks down on a little park smothered in almost tropical luxuriance of trees and flowers, where busts of minor Rumanian celebrities on marble columns stonily ignore each his marble wreath proffered by the languishing Muse kneeling on the pedestal. You've seen millions like them all over France. To the left lies the Atheneul, combining the functions of the Louvre, the Pantheon, and the Trocadero, and built to suggest the architecture of the Paris Opera. Its baroque dome bears aloft a frieze of gilt lyres, and the names of the great dead in gilt letters: Shakespeare, Cervantes, Pushkin, Camoens, Beethoven, Racine, etc., and two or three Rumanians unknown to the West. Eastward as far as one can see, red-tile roofs and white-stone copings pile up, broken with vivid masses of trees—palaces and mansions and hotels of the most florid modern French style, with an occasional Oriental dome or the bulb of a Rumanian Greek church. It is like a pleasure city built by Frenchmen in the south, this little "Paris of the Balkans," whose Rumanian name, Bucureshii, means literally "City of Joy."

At sunset the town wakes from the baking heat of a cloudless summer day. On the right the prints cipal and smartest street, Calea Victoriei, winds roaring between the High-Life Hotel (pronounced "HigLiff") and the Jockey Club building—which might have been bodily transplanted from the Boulevard Haussman. All the world is driving home from the races down on the Chaussee—a combination of the Bois de Boulogne and the Champs Elysees—where it has seen the stable of Mr. Alexandre Marghiloman, chief of the Germanophile branch of the Conservative party, win the Derby as usual—one, two, three. The regular evening parade begins. An endless file of handsome carriages, drawn by superb pairs of horses, trots smartly by in both directions along the twisting, narrow street. The coachmen wear blue-velvet robes to their feet, belted with bright satin ribbons whose ends flutter out behind, so you can guide them right or left by pulling the proper tab. These are public cabs owned communally by their drivers, who are all members of a strange Russian religious sect expelled from their own country; their belief requires that after they have married and had one child, they shall become eunuchs....

Each carriage is the setting for a woman or two women, rouged, enamelled, and dressed more fantastically than the wildest poster girl imagined by French decorators. A dense crowd overflowing from the sidewalks into the street moves slowly from the Atheneul up past the King's palace to the boulevards and back again—extravagant women, and youths made up like French decadent poets, and army officers in uniforms of pastel shades, with much gold lace, tassels on their boots, and caps of baby-blue and salmon-pink—color combinations that would make a comic-opera manager sick with envy. They have puffy cheeks and rings under their eyes, these officers, and their cheeks are sometimes painted, and they spend all their time riding up and down the Calea with their mistresses, or eating cream puffs at Capsha's pastry-shop, where all prominent and would-be prominent Bucarestians show themselves every day, and where the vital affairs of the nation are settled. What a contrast between the officers and the rank and file of the army—strong, stocky little peasants who swing by in squads to the blare of bugles, excellently equipped and trained! The numberless cafes and pastry-shops spill tables out on the sidewalk and the streets, crowded with debauched-looking men and women got up like chorus-girls. In the open cafe-gardens the gypsy orchestras swing into wild rhythms that get to be a habit like strong drink; a hundred restaurants fill with exotic crowds. Lights flash out. Shop windows gleam with jewels and costly things that men buy for their mistresses. Ten thousand public women parade—for your true Bucarestian boasts that his city supports more prostitutes in proportion than any other four cities in the world combined. ...

To look at it all you would imagine that Bucarest was as ancient as Sofia or Belgrade. The white stone weathers so swiftly under the hot, dry sun, the oily rich soil bears such a mellowing abundance of vegetation, life is so complex and sophisticated—yet thirty years ago there was nothing here but a wretched village, some old churches, and an older monastery which was the seat of a princely family. Bucarest is a getrich city, and modern Rumanian civilization is like that—a mushroom growth of thirty years. The fat plain is one of the greatest grain-growing regions in the world, and there are mountains covered with fine timber; but the mainspring of wealth is the oil region. There are oil kings and timber kings and land kings, quickly and fabulously wealthy. It costs more to live in Bucarest than in New York.

There is nothing original about the city, nothing individual. Everything is borrowed. A dinky little German King lives in a dinky little palace that looks like a French Prefecture, surrounded by a pompous little court. The government is modelled on that of Belgium. Although all titles of nobility except in the King's immediate family were abolished years ago, many people call themselves "Prince" and "Count" because their forefathers were Moldavian and Wallachian boyars; not to speak of the families who trace their descent from the Emperors of Byzantium! Poets and artists and musicians and doctors and lawyers and politicians have all studied in Paris—and of late Vienna, Berlin, or Munich. Cubism is more cubic and futurism more futuristic in Rumania than at home. Frenchified little policemen bully the marketbound peasants, who dare to drive across the Calea Victoriei and interrupt the procession of kept women. Cabarets and music-halls are like the less amusing places on Montmartre; you can see Revues based on dull French ones, copies of risqué comedies straight from the Theatre Antoine, or the National Theatre—which imitates the Com&lie Francaise, and looks like the Municipal Theatre at Lyons. A surface coating of French frivolity covers everything—without meaning and without charm.

If you want to infuriate a Rumanian, you need only speak of his country as a Balkan state.

"Balkan!" he cries. "Balkan! Rumania is not a Balkan state. How dare you confuse us with half-savage Greeks or Slavs! We are Latins."

One is never allowed to forget that; the newspapers insist every day that Rumanians are Latins—every day there is a reference to "our brothers, the French, or the Spaniards, or the Italians"—but really of purer blood than these "brothers," for the Rumanians are descendants of Roman veterans colonized in Transylvania by the Emperor Trajan. Some local writers complacently insist that Rumania is the inheritor of the Roman Empire; in a square in Bucarest there is a fountain showing Romulus and Remus suckled by the wolf, and some of the public buildings are adorned with the Insignia, the Fases, the Eagle, and "S. P. Q. R." But those Roman colonists may have been originally drafted into the legions from Tarsus, or the suburbs of Jerusalem, or south Germany. Add to that the blood of the native Dacians, a strong

Slavic strain, Magyar, Vtaque, and a great deal of gypsy, and you have the Rumanian.... He speaks a Latin language strongly impregnated with Slavic and Asiatic roots—an inflexible tongue to use, and harsh and unmusical to the ear. And he has Latin traits: excitability, candor, wit, and a talent for hysterical argument in critical situations. He is lazy and proud, like a Spaniard, but without a Spaniard's flavor; sceptical and libertine, like a Frenchman, but without a Frenchman's taste; melodramatic and emotional, like an Italian, without Italian charm. One good observer has called Rumanians "bad Frenchmen," and another "Italianized gypsies." Shopkeepers and cabmen and waiters in restaurants are thieving and ungracious; if they can't cheat you they fly into an ugly rage and scream like angry monkeys. How many times have Rumanian friends said to me: "Don't go to so-and-so's shop; he is a Rumanian and will cheat you. Find a German or French place."

It will be said that I have judged Rumanians by the people of Bucarest, and that Bucarest is not all Rumania. But I insist that the metropolis reflects the dominant traits of any nation—that Paris is essentially French, Berlin essentially Prussian, and Bucarest thoroughly Rumanian. Sometimes there are peasants on the street; the men in white linen trousers, and shirts that fall to their knees, embroidered in delicate designs of flowers, the women in richly decorated linen skirts and blouses of drawn work exquisitely worked in color, chains of gold coins hanging around their necks. They fit into the comic-opera scheme of things. But one hour by automobile from Bucarest you come upon a village where the people live in burrows in the ground, covered with roofs of dirt and straw. The ground their burrows are dug in is owned by a boyar—a landowning noble—who keeps a racing stable in France, and they till his land for him. Two per cent of the population can read and write. There is no school there. Several years ago the proprietor himself built a school for his people, on condition that the government would take it over and support it; for three years now it has been used as a storehouse.

These peasants eat nothing but corn—not because they are vegetarians, but because they are too poor to eat meat. And the church provides frequent fasts, which are the subject of laudatory comments on "frugality and thrift" by satisfied landowners. The peasants are very religious, or superstitious, whichever you want to call it. For instance, they believe that if a man dies without a lighted candle in his hand to guide him through the dark corridors of death, he will not reach heaven. Now many people do die suddenly without the lighted candle; and here is where the church comes in. The country priest charges the dead man's family eighty francs to get him into heaven without the candle, and a certain sum yearly to keep him there. The priest also takes advantage of the vampire legend—a superstition, widely believed in Hungary, the Balkans, and south Russia. If a peasant dies and others from his family or village follow in quick succession, the priest suggests that the dead man's spirit is a vampire. To lay this murdering ghost, the body must be exhumed in the dead of night (for it is strictly forbidden by Rumanian criminal law) and the heart torn out by an ordained priest, who drives a wooden peg through it. For this he charges a hundred francs.

Once I went north on a night train which carried the Crown Prince's private car. It was a cold night, with a wind that ate into your bones. Yet all night long we looked from our window upon a line of wretched peasants standing beside the track, one every quarter of a mile, ragged and shivering, holding torches above their heads to do honor to their prince....

Never was a country so ripe for revolution. More than fifty per cent of the arable land is owned by less than ten per cent of the country's landowners—some four and a half thousand big proprietors out of a population of seven and a half millions, seven-eighths of whom are working peasants; and this in spite of the fact that the government has been breaking up the big estates and selling land to the people since 1864. The hoyors and great landholders seldom live on their estates. Indeed, it is all they can do to keep up their hotels in Paris and Vienna, their houses in Bucarest, their villas at Nice, Constantza, and Sinaiia, their winters on the Riviera, art galleries, racing stables, and general blowing of money in the four quarters of the world. One family I met posed as great humanitarians because they provided mud huts for their people, and paid them twenty cents a day—with the cost of living almost what it is in New Jersey. Add to this hopeless condition of affairs the fact that all voters in Rumania are divided into three classes, on the basis of their incomes, so that about one hundred peasants' votes equal one rich man's vote. There have been several revolutions in Rumania, the last one purely agrarian, in 1907; but since the conscript army system exists, it is easy to order peasants in the south to shoot down their northern brothers, and vice versa. You have only to see the Rumanian peasants, gentle, submissive, with almost effeminate dress, manners—even their national songs and dances are pretty and soft—to realize how frightful the pressure that would force them to revolt.

What is the trend of Rumanian public opinion? There is no public opinion in Rumania. The peasants will fight for whatever their masters decide will give them the greatest country to exploit. It is simply another demonstration of how military service delivers a nation bound hand and foot to ambitious politicians. So one must ask the politicians, and they will reply that Rumania will join the side that satisfies "national aspirations"—as they call cupidity in the Balkans.

Now the Rumanians came originally from Transylvania, and settled the flat plain north of the Danube which includes Bessarabia, and stretches eastward to the Black Sea. A race of herders and farmers, they spread far; southern Bucovina is full of Rumanians, and they are found in compact groups throughout Bulgaria, Serbia, the Banat, Macedonia, and Greece. The most civilized section, Transylvania, was early drawn into the Hungarian kingdom; Bucovina was a present from the Turkish Sultan to the Emperor Joseph, and Bessarabia, twice Rumanian, was finally taken by Russia as the price of Rumanian independence after the battle of Plevna. And although many people now alive remember the passing of the Russian armies that freed Rumania from the Turk, they cannot forget the two million Rumanians who fell under the Russian yoke. It was partially to make up for the loss of that great province that Rumania stabbed Bulgaria in the back in 1913, and took away Silistria, where there was no Rumanian population. When there is no other reason for territorial conquest, this kind of "national aspirations" is excused by Balkanians on "strategical grounds."

Bessarabia was forcibly Russianized. The upper classes, of course, easily became Russian, but the prohibition of the Rumanian language in schools and churches had the effect of driving the peasants out of both—of making a brutalized and degraded race, who have lost all connection with or knowledge of their mother country.

In Transylvania, the birthplace of the race, and the Banat beyond, there are some three million Rumanians. But there, in spite of the desperate Hungarian campaign to Magyarize the people as the Russians did in Bessarabia, the racial feeling is strong and growing. The Transylvanians are rich and civilized; when the Rumanian tongue was banned in the higher schools and the churches, they fought a stubborn fight, crossing the mountains into Rumania for education, and spreading the nationalist propaganda at home and abroad so thoroughly that every Rumanian knows and feels for his oppressed brothers on the other side of the Carpathians, and you can travel across Hungary as far as Buda-Pesth and beyond without speaking any language but Rumanian.

So the "national aspirations" of Rumania, on "ethnographical grounds," include Bessarabia, Bucovina, Transylvania, and the Banat; and I have also seen a map in Bucarest, colored to show that Macedonia should really belong to Rumania, because the majority of the population are Rumanians!

All this does not excite the peasant to the verge of war on any side. But there is a mortal wrestlingmatch going on between pro-Teuton and pro-Ally politicians. How many obscure lawyers are now getting rich in the limelight of political prominence! In the Balkans politics is largely a personal matter; newspapers are the organs of individual men who have jockeyed themselves to be party leaders, in countries where a new party is born every hour over a glass of beer in the nearest cafe. For instance, La Politique is the organ of the millionaire Marghilomar lately chief of the Conservative party and only tially deposed. He was once so pro-French that it is said he used to send his laundry to Paris—but the Germans got him. His pro-Ally constituents split off under Mr. Filipescu, violently anti-German, whose organ is the Journal des Balkans.... Then there is the Independence Roumaine, property of the family of Mr. Bratianu, the premier—who was pro-German at the beginning of the war, but has become mildly pro-Ally—chief of the Liberal party now in power. And La Roumanie, mouthpiece of Mr. Take Ionescu, the leader of the Conservative Democrats, who is the most powerful force in the country on the side of the Entente Powers. The Conservatives are the great proprietors; the Liberals are the capitalists; the Conservative Democrats are about the same as our Progressives, and the peasants' Socialist Agrarian party doesn't count. But all internal programmes were forgotten at the question: On which side shall Rumania enter the war?

Two years ago old King Carol summoned a council of ministers and party leaders at Sinaia, and made a speech advocating immediate entrance on the side of the Central Powers. But when a vote was taken, only one man present was with the King. It was the first time his royal will had ever been thwarted, and a few days later he died without returning to the capital. Ferdinand, the present King, is in the same predicament, and, what is more, he has an English queen. ... It is a great game being fought over the heads of the King and the people by powerful financial interests, and the ambitions of political jugglers.

Meanwhile, a steady stream of Russian gold has poured into willing pockets, and the methodical Teutons have been creating public sentiment in their own inimitable way. Thousands of Germans and Austrians descended upon Bucarest in holiday attire, their wallets bulging with money. The hotels were full of them. They took the best seats at every play, violently applauding things German and Rumanian, hissing things French and English. They printed pro-German newspapers and distributed them free to the peasants. Restaurants and gambling casinos, dear to the Rumanian heart, were bought by them. German goods at reduced prices flooded the shops. They supported all the girls, bought all the champagne, corrupted all the government functionaries they could reach.... A nation-wide agitation was started about "our poor oppressed brothers in Russian Bessarabia"—in order to divert attention from Transylvania and stir up anti-Russian feeling.

To the Rumanian Government, Germany and Austria offered Bessarabia, including even Odessa, and Bucovina would also be ceded if she insisted. The Allies offered Transylvania, the Banat, and j. Bucc vina plateau north of her frontier. Although there was much talk in the press about "redecuin? Bessarabia," the Bessarabian question waM a vital one, while the Transylvania*iaQ* burning and immediate. Moreover, the know that Russia is a coming nation, and that forty years from now, even if defeated in this war, she will be there just the same, and stronger; while AustriaHungary is an old and disintegrating empire, whose drive will be no longer eastward.

Three times since the war began Rumania tentatively agreed with the Allies to enter—and three times she drew back: once in the early spring, when Russia was on the Carpathians, and again when Italy entered. The last time was when I saw Mr. Take Ionescu at midnight of the day that Bulgaria signed her agreement with Turkey.

"I think Bulgaria has chosen her side," he said very gravely. "We are not such babies as to believe that Turkey would give up any territory for nothing. The Central Powers will drive through Serbia—only we can stop that. And I am in a position to tell you that Serbia can claim our help if she is attacked. The Austrians have closed their frontier to us, and four hundred thousand men are said to be massed ready to march on Bucarest. It is a bluff—a bluff to force the resignation of the Bratianu cabinet, and the calling of Mr. Marghiloman to form a ministry—which would mean a German policy. Even if the Bratianu cabinet fell—which I doubt, for he is not for war—only he and the King working together could pave the way for Marghiloman. And that is impossible."

Three weeks later the German drive on Serbia began; but once more Rumania held aloof.

BULGARIA GOES TO WAR BUT the key to the Balkans is Bulgaria, not Rumania. Leaving Bucarest on a dirty little train, you crawl slowly south over the hot plain, passing wretched little villages made of mud and straw, like the habitations of an inferior tribe in Central Africa. Gentle, submissive-looking peasants in white linen, stand gaping stupidly at the engine. You stop at every tiny station, as if the Rumanian Government were contemptuously indifferent of any one going to Bulgaria, and at Giurgiu there is an unnecessarily rigid examination by petty despotic customs officials, who make it as disagreeable as possible to leave the country.

But across the yellow Danube is another world. While the steamer is yet a hundred yards from the landing-stage somebody hails you with a grin—a big brown policeman who has been in America, and whom you saw once as you passed that way two months ago. Good-natured, clumsy soldiers make a pretense of examining your baggage, and smile you a welcome. As you stand there a well-dressed stranger says in French: "You are a foreigner, aren't you? Can I do anything for you?" He is not a guide; he is just a passenger like yourself, but a Bulgarian and therefore friendly. It is wonderful to see again the simple, flat, frank faces of mountaineers and free men, and to fill your ears with the crackling virility of Slavic speech. Bulgaria is the only country I know where you can speak to any one on the street and get a cordial answer—where if a shopkeeper gives you the wrong change he will follow you to your hotel to return a two-cent piece. Never was sensation more poignant than our relief at being again in a real man's country.

The train labors up through Rustchuk—half Turkish with its minarets, spreading tile roofs, peasants wearing baggy trousers, red sashes, and turbans—into mighty uplands that roll south ever higher toward the mountains. A marriage procession passes; four ox-carts full of uproarious men and girls waving paper streamers, and gay with embroideries of white linen, chains of gold coins, bright-colored blankets, bunches of grapes, and flowers. Ahead a man rides a mule, beating a drum, and a wild squadron of youths on horseback scurry shouting over the plain.... Night falls—the cold night of high altitudes—and you wake in the morning hurrying down a winding gorge beside a mountain torrent, between high hills of rocks and scrub, where herdsmen in brown homespun pasture their goats against the sky; past ravines in which little villages are caught, irregular and Turkish, their red roofs smothered in fruit-trees; until finally the mountains break, and you see Sofia crowning her little hill like a toy city of red and yellow, topped by her golden dome and overshadowed by her mountain.

Nothing could be more different from Bucarest than Sofia. A sober little town of practical, ugly buildings, and clean streets paved with brick. Telephone-wires run overhead; many street-cars clang along. Except for an occasional ancient mosque or Byzantine ruin, and a sudden glimpse of shabby squares full of peasants in turbans squatting on their heels, it might be a bustling new city of the Pacific Northwest. There is one hotel where literally everybody goes—the Grand Hotel de Bulgaria; next door is the Grand Cafe de Bulgaria, where journalists make news, magnates plot and combine, lawyers blackmail, and politicians upset ministries. If you want an interview with the premier or one of the ministers—in one case I know of, with the King—you get a bell-boy of the Grand Hotel to call him up on the telephone. Or if you don't want to do that, simply take a table in the Grand Cafe—they will all come in some time during the day.... Sofia is a little place, friendly and accessible. The unpretentious Royal Palace is right across the street; the National Theatre one block down; the House of Parliament, or So-branti, two blocks in the other direction, near the Foreign Office, and the Cathedral and Holy Synod just beyond. Every one of any importance lives in a radius of five blocks....

Toward evening the town gets on its best clothes, and strolls out the avenue of the Tsar Liberator to Prince Boris Park. It is a solemn domestic little parade of country people with their wives, daughters, sweethearts, and all the children. The women are comfortably unattractive, and they dress in last year's rural styles. Many officers mingle with the crowd—officers who wear smart, practical uniforms built for campaigning, and look as if they knew how to fight. Squads of burly soldiers in peaked caps and boots tramp stiffly by, roaring slow, hymn-like songs such as you hear in the Russian army....

Darkness brings a chill—for Sofia is a thousand feet up—and sharp on the stroke of eight the crowd scatters home to dinner. There is no restaurant except your hotel, and the food has no subtlety—ham and eggs and spinach being the Bulgarian's favorite dish. Afterward you can sit in the National Casino in the Public Gardens, and drink beer to the strains of a fine military band, or you can listen to interminable Bulgarian dialogues at the Municipal Theatre. There is only one music-hall, called "New America," a dreary place where heavily humorous comedians and unshapely dancers delight the guffawing peasants who have come to town on a jag.

The number of people who speak English is amazing. Almost all the political leaders have been educated at Roberts College, the American missionary school in Constantinople. Roberts College has had such an influence on Bulgaria, that after the consolidation of the country and establishment of the kingdom in 1885, it was hailed as "cradle of Bulgarian liberty." That's why Sofia is so American, and that's why so many American methods are used in Bulgarian politics—even our kind of graft! But there are more powerful influences. Bulgaria was nearest to Constantinople, and longer subject to the Turks than any other Balkan country—the language is full of Turkish words, and the popular life of Turkish customs. Then Russia's freeing her in 1876 turned the entire trend of Bulgarian thought toward her mighty Slav brother. There was also a group of intellectuals, fighting to free Macedonia, who imbibed republican ideals in France. And lastly, Bulgarian army officers, scientists, teachers, journalists, and politicians, for the last fifteen years have studied almost exclusively in Germany.

An hour by automobile from Sofia lies a typical Bulgarian village. The fields around it are owned and farmed communally by the inhabitants, except for the lands belonging to the monastery at the top of the hill. A wild mountain stream tumbling down the ravine turns the wheels of fourteen mills, where the peasants grind their corn; and since the mills all charge the same price, and the highest mill had no trade at all, the peasants and the monks together have agreed to abolish all mills, and build a single large one run by electricity generated by the stream, to be owned in common by the village. Broad, comfortable houses with tile roofs, built of wood or stone or baked clay, straggle along the cobbled streets. Every one seems happy and prosperous, for in Bulgaria each peasant can own five inalienable acres of land, and, as in Serbia, there are no rich men. At the end of the street is a big, fine public school, with room for all the children, and teachers trained in Germany. Telegraph and telephone, train and automobile road connect it with the city. And these evidences of organization and progress are to be seen all over Bulgaria. King Ferdinand and the group of scientific experts with which he has surrounded himself are chiefly responsible for all this. The Bulgars are loyal, honest and easily disciplined, in contrast to the anarchistic Serbs. Centuries of Turkish tyranny have helped to prepare them for the hand of the organizer.

I know three derisive stories told by the peasants of other Balkan peoples about Bulgars for seven hundred years, which illustrate the Bulgarian character better than anything I could say.

A Bulgar who had been mowing late in his fields went home at night with his scythe over his shoulder. Coming to a well, he looked down and saw the moon reflected in it. "Good God!" he cried, "the moon has fallen into the well. I must save it!" So he put his scythe into the water and pulled. But the scythe caught in the rocks of the well. He pulled and pulled and pulled. Suddenly the rock gave way and he fell on his back. Above him in the sky was the moon. "Ha," said he with satisfaction, "I have rescued the moon!"

Four Bulgars walking across the fields came to a pond with a willow-tree bending over it. Wind rustled the leaves and the peasants stopped to look at it. "The tree's talking," said one. "What is it saying?" The others scratched their heads. "It probably says that it wants a drink," replied another. Filled with pity for the poor thirsty tree, the Bulgars climbed out on the branch and weighed it down into the water. It broke and they all drowned.

The Bulgarian army, so goes the story, had been besieging Constantinople for two years without the slightest result. They took counsel together and decided to push down the wall. So the soldiers strung themselves all around the city with their backs to the wall and began to push. They pushed and sweated with all their strength—they pushed so hard that their feet began to sink into the ground. Feeling something give way, the whole army shouted: "Just a little more now! Keep on pushing! She's moving!"

The Bulgarians were originally a Mongolian race, who invaded the Balkan Peninsula in the seventh century and mingled with the Slavs they found there. Under the legendary Tsar Simeon they erected by conquest an ephemeral "empire," which extended from Adrianople to the mouths of the Danube, northwest so as to include Transylvania and all of Hungary, then south to the Adriatic, taking in Bosnia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, Serbia, Albania, Epirus, and Thessaly—and east to Thrace. Two hundred years later, a Serbian "empire" under the mythical Tsar Dushan had conquered the same territory and subjugated the Bulgars. In the thirteenth century the Bulgars predominated again, and in the fourteenth the Serbs had their turn. Twice during this time Bulgarians laid siege to Byzantium. I mention this to explain Bulgarian "national aspirations" on "historical grounds"—like all Balkan "aspirations," they are practically boundless.

But the Bulgars are really very simple people, without guile. Why, then, did they enter the war on the side of Germany and Austria? And to go further back, why did they break the Balkan Alliance and provoke the second Balkan War? It is again a question of "aspirations."

The Macedonian question has been the cause of every great European war for the last fifty years, and until that is settled there will be no more peace either in the Balkans or out of them. Macedonia is the most frightful mix-up of races ever imagined. Turks, Albanians, Serbs, Rumanians, Greeks, and Bulgarians live there side by side without mingling—and have so lived since the days of St. Paul. In a space of five square miles you will find six villages of six different nationalities, each with its own customs, language, and traditions. But the vast majority of the population of Macedonia are Bulgars; up to the time of the first Balkan War no intelligent Greek or Serbian or Rumanian ever denied this. Almost all Bulgaria's great men have come from Macedonia. They were the first people, when Macedonia was a Turkish province, to found national schools there, and when the Bulgarian Church revolted from the Greek Patriarch at Constantinople—no other Balkan Church is free—the Turks allowed them to establish bishoprics, because it was so evident that Macedonia was Bulgarian. Ambitious Serbian nationalists followed the Bulgarian example of establishing schools in Macedonia, and sent comitadjis there to fight the Bulgarian influence; but Serbian scientists and political leaders recognized for a century that Macedonia was peopled with Bulgarians. The Serbians did not spread south; they came from the north and spread east through Bosnia, Herzegovina, Dalmatia, and beyond Trieste—and that way their logical ambitions lie.

During the last years of Balkan turmoil under the Ottomans, when the Great Powers were bawling for reform in the European vilayets, and the end of the Turkish Empire was in sight, Greece also sent comitadjis to Macedonia to wage an underground bandit warfare on the Serbs and Bulgars, with the hope of eventually getting a slice. But up to the outbreak of the Balkan War no responsible Greek ever dared to claim Macedonia on any other but "historical" grounds. Constantinople, parts of Thrace, Asia Minor, and the European littoral of the JEgean and Black Seas were claimed by Greece because Greeks lived there. But that was all.

Even in the treaties of the Balkan Alliance that preceded the war of 1912, Serbia recognized Macedonia as Bulgarian. Mr. Milanovitch, the premier who helped draw the treaties, said; "There are districts which cannot be disputed between 1 Adrianople ought to go to Bulgaria. Old Serbia no of the Char Planina Mountains ought to go to!

317 k

E

Most of Macedonia will be Bulgarian. But a strip of eastern Macedonia ought to be given to Serbia. And the best thing will be to leave the division to the Emperor of Russia as arbitrator." And this was inserted in the treaty. Greece also accepted the principle of Bulgarian dominance.

When the Balkan conflict exploded, Bulgaria, with her superior army, was to leave a strong force in Macedonia, and aid Serbia with more troops if she found things difficult. But, on the contrary, it was Serbia who sent aid to the Bulgars in Thrace; this, Serbia called "the first violation of the agreement." Adrianople fallen, the Bulgars pressed on, amazed at their success. They said they would stop at a line drawn through Midia on the Black Sea to Enos on the ITgean; but the Turks tried so frantically to make peace that they broke the armistice, and drove straight for Constantinople. Only Tchataldja stopped them, and they might finally have stormed that if events in their rear hadn't taken a disquieting turn.

In the meanwhile the Serbians and Greeks, who had occupied all of Macedonia, Epirus, and Thessaly, were jealous of the boundless Bulgar ambition. Nothing in the Balkan Alliance had given Bulgaria the right to seize the capital of the Eastern world. Together Greece and Serbia had conquered the western vilayets, and they didn't see why they should give up territory fairly won to any powerful Balkan Empire—no matter what the treaties were. So they made a secret treaty and quietly went to work to Grecianize and Serbianize their new territories. A thousand Greek and Serbian publicists began to fill the world with their shouting about the essentially Greek or Serbian character of the populations of their different spheres. The Serbs gave the unhappy Macedonians twenty-four hours to renounce their nationality and proclaim themselves Serbs, and the Greeks did the same. Refusal meant murder or expulsion. Greek and Serbian colonists were poured into the occupied country and given the property of fleeing Macedonians. Bulgarian school-teachers were shot without mercy, and Bulgarian priests given the choice of death or conversion to the Orthodox religion. The Greek newspapers began to talk about a Macedonia peopled entirely with Greeks—and they explained the fact that no one spoke Greek, by calling the people "Bulgarophone" Greeks or "Vlaquophone" Greeks. The Serbs more diplomatically called them "Macedonian Slavs." The Greek army entered villages where no one spoke their language. "What do you mean by speaking Bulgarian?" cried the officers. "This is Greece and you must speak Greek." Refusal to do so meant death or flight.

Bulgaria concluded a hasty peace with the Turks and turned her attention westward. The Serbs and Greeks were evasive—they declared the Balkan Alliance had been broken by their ally. Bulgaria called Cf upon the Tzar to arbitrate, but Serbia, in possession, of far more than she ever had dreamed of gaining, realized that she had powerful friends: Russia, alarm at the gigantic ambition of her protegee and Austria, who wanted no powerful state in the Balkans. Finally Tzar Nicholas agreed to settle the question; but just as the two delegates were about to start for St. Petersburg, Bulgaria took a step that justified the fears of the Great Powers, alienated the world's sympathy, and lost her Macedonia. Without warning, her armies suddenly attacked the Serbs and the Greeks and marched on Salonika. The Bulgarian people was not consulted. The news came as a shock to the cabinet, whose policy was one of conciliation and peace. Consternation and fury broke loose in Sofia. Who had given the order? There was only one person who could have done so, and that was King Ferdinand.

King Ferdinand is a regular romantic Balkan King. He perpetually sees himself riding into Constantinople on a white horse—the Tzar of an immense, belligerent empire. And as I write this he has again hurled his people against their will into a war from which they cannot emerge except as losers.

I saw it all. I was in Sofia when the Entente Powers made their offer, and from then off and on until the end. The Allies offered as the price of intervention all of Serbian Macedonia to the Char Planina Mountains, Thrace, and diplomatic support for the recovery of Grecian Macedonia and Silistria. The Central Powers would give Macedonia, part of Serbia, Silistria, free access to Cavalla and Salonika, and a slice of Turkey to be ceded immediately. Germany told Bulgaria that she need only effect a junction with the German forces through Serbian Macedonia, and then she could turn all her attention to occupying these territories; while the Allies wanted her to attack the Turks, and wait for compensation until after the war. The Bulgars clamored for immediate occupation.... The Allies replied that they would guarantee her countries for her by occupying the line of the Vardar with Allied troops. But the Bulgarian Government was sceptical of promises to be redeemed "after the war."

The premier, Mr. Radoslavov, said on July 15: "Bulgaria is prepared and ready to enter the war immediately absolute guarantees can be given her that... she will attain... the realization of her national ideals. The bulk of these aspirations are comprised in Serbian Macedonia, with its Bulgarian population of one and a half millions. It was pledged and assigned to us at the end of the first Balkan War, and it is still ours by right of nationality. When the Powers of the Triple Entente can assure us this territory, and assure us that our minor claims in Grecian Macedonia and elsewhere will be realized, they will find us ready to march with them. But these guarantees must be real and absolute. No mere paper ones can be accepted. Only certainty on this point can induce our people again to pour out their blood."

In that he had the country with him, for there is a very decided public opinion among the Bulgarian peasants. In the first place more than half a million Bulgarians fled from persecution in Macedonia under Turks, Greeks, and Serbs and were scattered throughout the villages of Bulgaria, forever preaching the liberation of their country. In the middle of the summer half the population of Sofia was composed of Macedonian refugees, and you could visit a camp in the outskirts of the city where sixteen thousand of them lived under tents, at great expense and annoyance to the government. While I was in Sofia in September, there arrived five thousand Bulgarians who had been taken prisoners by the Austrians after being forced to serve in the Serbian army—returned with the compliments of the Emperor Franz Joseph. Every day the press was full of bitter tales brought by the refugees, and expressions of hatred against the Serbians; the Serbian press responded as bitterly, accusing the Bulgarians of raiding across the frontier, burning and slaughtering. Both were true. To offset this hatred there was the traditional love and gratefulness—very strong among the peasants—to Russia the Liberator, and the memory of the generation who had seen her armies rout the Turks.

Bulgarian statesmen are just as they are in Rumania; they play the game of personal ambition and personal profits—with the important difference that in Bulgaria they must wheedle the people, and are subject to an unscrupulous and irresponsible monarch who has real royal power. All Bulgarians were agreed on the programme of regaining Macedonia; they only differed on the question of which group of Powers could give it to them. As Mr. Joseph Herbst said to me: "If Zululand would give us Macedonia we would march with Zululand!" A bitter and exhausting struggle went on between the two parties—between hatred of the Serbs and love for Russia. The Radoslavov government showed itself benevolent toward the Central Powers in a hundred ways—for instance, by allowing the military censorship to suppress six pro-Ally newspapers on the ground that they were "bought with Russian gold."

By an agreement of all political parties at the outbreak of the European war, power to act was left in the hands of the government, and the Sobranie adjourned indefinitely. But as the government's attitude became denned, the growing opposition demanded the calling of Parliament to consider the country's position. This the King absolutely refused to do, for he knew that the majority of the country was still pro-Ally. In its desperation the Liberal government was forced to a trick. The provinces of New Bulgaria were electing their first deputies, and they were so gerrymandered that all the twenty deputies were Liberals. How the voters felt about it was made plain when a confidential man journeyed south to find out what side the peasants would like to fight on. "You give us guns first," they replied threateningly, "and we'll show you which side we'll fight on!" In spite of the twenty, however, there was still a majority against the Germans when Bulgaria went to war.

As I passed through Sofia in the middle of August the pro-Ally sympathizers were jubilant. Mr. Guenadiev, leader of the Stamboulovist party, seemed to think Bulgaria would accept the last offer of the Entente Powers, to which Serbia had conditionally agreed. Mr. Guechov, chief of the Nationalists, talked of a coming demonstration in force by the opposition, to compel the summoning of the Sobranie. And Mr. Malinov of the Democratic party believed that his country knew how fatal to Bulgarian preponderance would be the German drive eastward.

But when I returned two weeks later all was changed. The Duke of Mecklenburg had twice visited the King, the Turco-Bulgarian secret treaty had been signed, the first gold instalment of an immense German loan had arrived, and Mr. Guechov told me that the Central Powers were now urging Bulgaria to attack Rumania, in case attempted negotiations between Austria and Serbia came off. "If the Germans come through Serbia to our frontier," said Mr. Guenadiev, "what can our small army do against them? We do not want to be another Belgium." A politician who had once told me with glowing approval how the peasants loved Russia, now seemed lukewarm. "The peasants are very simple folk," said he; "they remember Russia the Liberator, but they are not intelligent enough to realize that freeing Bulgaria was merely a step in the Russian march toward Constantinople. You and I know better; we understand that the peasants will do what they are told, and that a people needs thoughtful leaders." And he hurried away with an important, furtive air.

In the first week in September the Opolchenie, or Macedonian Legion, composed of refugees, was called to the colors "for forty-five days' training." No one was fooled. The government press breathed double hate against the Serbs, and cried: "Macedonians! The hour is at hand to free your country from the oppressor!" Sixteen thousand Macedonians were summoned—sixty thousand responded, and with them some fifteen thousand Albanians, and ten thousand Armenians who had been given asylum from Turkish persecution. A grand demonstration was arranged with true Bulgarian thoroughness; the new volunteers, all slow, exalted faces, and rough, brown homespun, surged through the streets cheering and singing behind their war-worn flag. They knew that they were to head a Bulgarian invasion of Macedonia. In twenty speeches delivered from the balcony of the Military Club, from the steps of the Sobranie, and from the Tsar Liberator monument, they were told so.

Next Sunday, September 6, was the national holiday, celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of the union of the Bulgarian kingdom. The printed programme of the parade announced that the Opolchenie and the troops of the garrison of Sofia would participate; but on Saturday night a Bulgarian wood merchant told me that he had received an order from the government to unload twelve railroad cars full of timber in four hours, and turn them over to the government. Late in the evening most of the cab horses in the city were seized by government quartermasters. That very night the Macedonians mysteriously disappeared; and when the parade began in the morning the garrison of Sofia—horse, foot, and artillery—had also vanished, except for two companies. In the afternoon there was a grand patriotic demonstration by civilians, punctuated with bellicose speeches; in the evening a torchlight procession of students singing Macedonian songs. My, how full of politicians and journalists was the Grand Cafe de Bulgaria that night! But, in spite of the national holiday and the critical situation of events, there was no excitement whatever. There never is in Sofia—the Bulgars are an unemotional people. Even the demonstrations were methodical, organized, and directed like flocks of sheep. The party chiefs and politicians refused to be interviewed—and when that occurs in Bulgaria, things are serious indeed. Too late the Opposition leaders were scurrying around for support to stop the resistless march of events.

The last act of the coup d'etat was brief and dramatic. On Friday, September 18, the Opposition leaders, representing six out of the eleven Bulgarian parties, had a conference with the King. Tsanov, representing the two Radical parties, Danev the Progressive Liberals, Stamboliisky the Agrarians, Guechov the Nationalists, and Malinov the Democrats, were received by his majesty in the presence of his secretary, Doctor Dobrovitch, and the Crown Prince Boris. Malinov, in his speech, said that the military situation in Europe and the political situation in the country made it extremely dangerous for Bulgaria to enter the war on either side at present. He believed firmly in continued neutrality; but if the government thought that entrance in the war would help realize the national ideals, his constituents desired that it should be on the side of the Entente Powers. Stamboliisky then presented a memorandum signed by himself and his colleagues, which respectfully demanded: First. That the government should take no action without calling the Sobranie and consulting the wishes of the country.

Second. That before any action was taken a coalition cabinet should be formed (after the model of the English and French war governments), with an enlarged number of ministers to represent the eleven political parties. Third. That the Crown should present to the government in power the demands of the Opposition, with the indorsement of the Crown.

Guechov took the floor, pointing out by means of figures and calculations the inevitable final victory of the Entente Powers. "The moment for our entrance into the war is unripe," he said. Tsanov followed with a speech along the same general lines; and after a discussion precising the details of the memorandum, the King, Prince Boris, and Doctor Dobrovitch withdrew for a private discussion.

When they returned it became apparent from what Doctor Dobrovitch said that the government had made up its mind to a course of action, on the basis of information which could not be made public.

"What most concerns the people of this country," burst out Stamboliisky, "must remain a secret then?"

"I had no idea that you represented the people of this country, Mr. Stamboliisky," said the King. "Why is it that you have never come to see me before?"

"Because the democratic principles of my party forbid it," said Stamboliisky; "but I waive principles when the country is in danger. And let me remind your Majesty that dynasties which thwart the popular will do not last long!"

"My head is old," replied the King, "and not of much value. But you had better take care of your own!"

In vain Malinov and Guechov tried to quiet things. By this time Tzanov had lost his temper and joined Stamboliisky, and "for a while," said an imaginative observer, "they all kicked each other's shins."

Finally the King rose and said very sternly: "Gentlemen, I shall present your demands to the government. I can tell you that we have decided on a policy which will be thoroughly carried out at any cost. Mr. Stamboliisky, I am happy at last to have made your acquaintance!"

Two days later we left Sofia for Nish, and three days after that the Bulgarian mobilization was announced.

SERBIA REVISITED, AND GREECE
FD7TEEN minutes out from Sofia the train plunges again into mounting defiles between ever more towering hills, through tunnel after tunnel. Stony peaks colored wonderfully in reds and browns and subtle grays seem animals crouching, so living is their texture. Southward the crinkled Balkans march across the sky, blue with distance. It is a breeding-place of hard men and fighters. Two hours, and we are over the divide, screaming down beside a stream that leaps in cascades. A dry, hot, little valley opens out, ringed around with arid mountains; there lies Tsaribrod, the last Bulgarian station, piled high with heaps of army supplies and buzzing with troops. A neat little town with substantial houses and public buildings, two factories, good roads running east and north, schools, electric lights, and a sewer system. A neat little station paved with concrete, where the ticketagent who was so cordial when we stopped there four months ago, leans from his window to shake hands. The train roars through a tunnel, and twists between precipitous hills. Where they open out a little, arid and quivering with heat, lies Pirot, the first town in Serbia.

What a contrast even between these two first cousins—Bulgars and Serbs! The town straggled out, an overgrown village, all deep, wide houses roofed with Turkish tiles; no school visible. On the dirt platform before the ramshackle wooden station, a customs officer, the station-master in gold-lace uniform with a sword, a policeman in blue with red facings, and a sword, too, and two army officers, were having an animated discussion, entirely oblivious of the train. The rapid, flexible eloquence of the Serbian language struck on our ears like a jet of fresh water. Around them in easy familiarity crowded peasant soldiers in shabby gray uniforms, sandals, and the distinctive crushed-in cap of the Serbian army, listening and joining in the argument.

"Mr. Pachitch!" cried the station-master vehemently: "Mr. Pachitch is no true Serbian! His father was a Bulgarian and his mother was a Turk! Who couldn't make a better prime minister than any Young Radical?" He pounded himself on the chest. "Why, I myself"

The customs officer slapped the major on the shoulder, and burst into a shout of laughter. All the soldiers laughed, too. Down at the end of the station fence, reservists of the last call were coming through a gate, one by one, while a sergeant called their names on the roster and ticked them off. Old men and young boys they were, in every variety of improvised uniform, tattered sandals on their feet— but all with the military cap and all equipped with new rifles. A boy who could not have been more than sixteen, so drunk that he could hardly stagger, reeled through with his peasant mother holding him upright. The tears streamed down her face; she wiped his sweating face with a handkerchief and straightened his lapels, and patted him twice on the chest. Growling, he made for the sleeping-car. A policeman grabbed him by the arm. "Forward!" he yelled; "get forward into the box car!" Without a word the boy threw his arms around the policeman and they fell to the ground, a waving mass of arms and legs. Everybody laughed. An incredibly aged man with one arm came hobbling up on a stick and touched a gray-haired giant who bore a rifle. He turned and they kissed each other on the mouth. Tears ran down the old man's face. "Do not let the Bulgars through!" he shrilled....

The customs officer came into our apartment. He simply glanced at our passports and never touched the baggage.

"You came from Sofia?" he said eagerly, sitting down and offering cigarettes. "What is the news? We've been hearing exciting rumors here. Is Bulgaria going to war? She'd better not—we'll march to Sofia in two days!"

"But if Austria and Germany attack you?"

"Pooh, they tried it once! Let them all come! Serbia can whip the world!..."

Ahead of us, as the train rattled along, rose a great chorus from five box cars full of soldiers. They were singing a new ballad about the Bulgarians, which began:

"King Ferdinand, the Bulgar, got up one day in his palace in Sofia and looked out the window, And he said to his son, the Crown Prince Boris: 'My son and heir, it is a fine day and the Serbian army is very busy, So I think if we attack their women and children we may not be defeated....'" the Greek frontier is of a mob of money-changers, bootblacks, venders of chocolates and fruit and last week's papers—shrewd, brown little traders of harsh, quick speech and keen eyes. Three years ago there were no Greeks whatever in this arid mountain valley of southern Macedonia; now it is all Greek. That is what happens in every new Greek country; all but the lowest peasants tilling the soil are forced out by the most bitter economic competition—and even they are working for Greeks. The Rumanians are gay and graceful; the Bulgars honest and friendly; the Serbs witty, brave, and charming; after these the Greeks seem a stunted, unfriendly people without any flavor.

One's first impression on crossing

I think I must have asked a hundred Greek soldiers what they thought of the war. Now the salient characteristic of Balkan peoples is bitter hatred of the nearest aliens. The Greeks hated the Serbians normally, but when they spoke of the Bulgars it was in terms of torture and burning alive. Venezelos they idolized almost to a man; but I found that they would even vote against him, for they thought he meant to force them into war—and the Greeks did not want to fight. But Greeks are very sentimental; you only have to wave a flag and shout "glory" to them, and they will go to war for a good cause or a bad one. Greek ambitions are limitless. They consider themselves the heirs of Periclean Athens, of the Byzantine Empire, the conquests of Alexander the Great, and the far-flung colonies of the ancient Greek city-states. An editorial paragraph from a Greek newspaper displays their ordinary frame of mind:

"Greece, which has a history five thousand years old, and is the mother of Western civilization, should not let itself be surpassed by nations who have managed to assemble their children under their hegemony, as Piedmont dominated Italy, as Prussia dominated Germany. The Hellenic nation should not show itself incompetent, powerless, and inferior to certain new states, such as Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, which are so many mosaics constituted in Europe by barbarians coming from Central Asia."

And this in face of the fact that the new Greek provinces are inefficiently and corruptly governed, and that Athens itself is a hotbed of lies and bribery. A typical example is the Greek railroad official who was bribed by Germans to hinder the mobilization of the Greek army. And remember, that the first time the casus federis of the Greco-Serbian treaty was ever invoked Greece refused to fulfil her obligations....

The last day I was at Salonika a great cloud of black smoke appeared at the foot of the gulf; a little destroyer steamed full speed for the city and anchored off the quai. Three boats were landed, containing English officers in campaign uniform, with the red tabs that mark Staff officials, twenty-five boxes and trunks, and a couple of British marines carrying rifles with fixed bayonets. The baggage was piled in the street and the officers went into the Hotel de Rome. In fifteen minutes the rumor was all over the town that Sir Ian Hamilton was in Salonika. Wild excitement seized the Greek officials. Around the two sentries guarding the baggage prowled a solemn, uneasy circle of policemen; a dense mass of townspeople stood silently watching. Hot wires clamored the news to Athens; frightened officials cried: "What does it mean? What shall we do?"

In the meantime we had run into the King of England's Messenger on his way home through Italy with despatches from the Balkans. He was pretty reasonably mellow with much Scotch and soda, as we went to lunch in the Hotel de Rome.

Five tables away from us sat the general himself—a tall, bronzed, solid Englishman with a gray mustache—and all his Staff. He and the King's Messenger bowed to one another. A few minutes afterward a waiter came to our table.

"General Hamilton would like to speak with the King's Messenger." Our friend rose, reeling slightly, and went over. Pretty soon he came back, holding on to chairs and piloting himself with difficulty. He sat down at the table and grinned.

"It is too, too funny," he said weakly. "The old duffer wants me to go immediately to Athens and ask the British ambassador for instructions.

"'Damme,' he said to me, 'what the devil have they sent us here for? Here I am—and not a word of instructions. What the devil do they want me to do?'"

That night we took ship for the Piraeus and home. Next morning, steaming down between far islands that lay like clouds on the sea, we met twelve transports full of British troops on their way to Salonika.

THE BORROWER WILL BE CHARGED AN OVERDUE FEE IF THIS BOOK IS NOT RETURNED TO THE LIBRARY ON OR BEFORE THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW. NON-RECEIPT OF OVERDUE NOTICES DOES NOT EXEMPT THE BORROWER FROM OVERDUE FEES.
Harvard College Widener Library
ibridge, MA02138 (617)495-2413

CPSIA information can be obtained at www.ICGtesting.com
Printed in the USA
LVOW03s1151291115

464261LV00022B/189/P

9 781230 44689

Cover art: Mike Keeling; © 2011

07-CQQ-594

